Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Unless it is a substantial compliance, unless the law now substantially complies. The fact of the matter is most of the States will have to make some modification of their pension laws to come within the provisions of this bill.

Mr. MOTT. How will the term "substantial compliance" be interpreted?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. That is a matter to be determined by the social security board; but I take it they are not going to split hairs.

Mr. MOTT. They are going to interpret it liberally?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Yes.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, to clarify the situation, under the Russell amendment States would receive up to $15 a month without financial participation for 2 years. Under the amendment as brought in by the conferees the proposition of matching is still intact as originally provided in the House bill, and dollar for dollar has to be matched when the State participates.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I will say to the gentleman as a Member of this House you have put back upon your State the responsibility of restoring this matching provision. The money may be contributed by the communities or subdivisions of the State, for instance, but the Federal money must be matched by money within the State to make it possible for them to participate.

Mr. FERGUSON. All this requires is that the State get the money from some source if the constitution prohibits action by the State legislature.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. All this does is to make State participation possible by getting money from some subdivision of the State.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I yield.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. I wish the gentleman would explain this situation: In the State of Pennsylvania it will be necessary to amend the State constitution before an old-age-pension law can be passed; it is forbidden by the constitution. It would take at least 5 years to amend the constitution.

The legislature has appropriated money to give the aged relief. In the gentleman's opinion, will this bill help the aged of Pennsylvania?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. It will if the counties, or some other subdivisions of the State government, will contribute pension money to match the Federal contribution.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. It is not a form of pension, because the State constitution forbids it.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I could not answer, for I do not know what the facts are.

Mr. BOILEAU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BOILEAU. May I ask the gentleman to explain the situation in the conference agreement with reference to the State pools and the reserves within those States?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. That is the La Follette amendment. The House yielded on the La Follette amendment and it goes in here as passed by the Senate. The gentleman understands what the La Follette amendment is?

Mr. BOILEAU. Yes.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The House yielded on that matter. I am not going to take more time on the La Follette amendment because it would take longer than I have at my disposal, but I think the House will be pleased to go along with it.

The social security board as provided in the House was an independent agency and the Senate put it under the Department of Labor. The conference report presents an agreement in reference to that matter. The original provision of the House bill is maintained. In other words, the social security board will be an independent agency of the Government.

We have title 10 put in by a Senate amendment, which has to do with pensions for the blind. The provisions of that amendment as agreed to by the House and as included in the conference report are that the needy blind, regardless of age, are under State plans permitted to have Federal assistance, and the Government will match State money to the extent of $15; in other words, on the same basis as the Federal participation in old-age assistance, except there is no age limit.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. With reference to pensions for the blind in those States that do not give blind people a pension, may I ask if this bill will help the blind in those particular States?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. It will not, until they adopt pension plans or what we may call "assistance plans."

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. There are only 22 States in the Union that give benefits to the blind. The blind in those States will receive benefits, while the blind in the other States will not.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Only those States that have provision for the pensioning of the blind will get assistance from the Federal Government under this bill.

The Senate receded in reference to title 11, placed in there by Senate amendment, which provides a pension of $30 a month for needy Indians, to be paid wholly by the Federal Government. There were many provisions in there that we thought were ill-advised. The legislation was hastily drawn and hastily passed, as we thought, without proper consideration, and while we had a sympathetic interest in the aged and needy Indians, yet we felt that if we were to give them assistance in the form of pensions the matter should have more consideration than had been given the subject and more consideration than could be given the subject in this particular legislation; therefore, the Senate receded, and that title is out.

Mr. DIMOND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I yield to the gentleman from Alaska.

Mr. DIMOND. Is it the gentleman's idea that the bill as drawn applies to Indians as well as other citizens of the United States?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. It does. It is my opinion that aged Indians will receive the same benefits as aged white people or any other aged of the United States, because the Indians are by virtue of an act of Congress of 1924 citizens of the United States and have the same status as any other citizen of our country. Therefore, they are entitled to the provisions of the old-age pension under this title.

Mr. DIMOND. Then the striking out or the elimination of the Senate amendment with respect to Indians does not mean that this bill does not apply to Indians?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. It does not mean that, but it does mean that the bill will apply to Indians, needy, aged, and that they will come under the provisions of title 1.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, may I say at the outset that the conferees on this bill, both on the part of the Senate and the House, have devoted a great deal of attention in a very sincere and practical way to clearing up some great differences which existed in the two bills as passed by the respective bodies. There is but one impasse. We reached the point where the conferees could not compromise or agree in any way or manner in relation to what is known as the "Clark amendment."

The conference report has been explained partially by the gentleman from Washington, and he has made a careful analysis of it for the Members of the House. A little later, I understand, the chairman is agreeable to having the Clark amendment alone discussed in some detail. At that time I shall take the opportunity of speaking in support of the Clark amendment.

The minority members were glad to sign the conference report. While some of us on this side have been opposed to the whole scheme as outlined in this bill, that is water over the dam and no longer a factor. The bill has been accepted in all these details by both branches, and the job of the conferees was simply to straighten out the differences between the two branches and not go to the fundamental principles of the measure. I think the chairman of the committee and his majority colleagues are entitled to a great deal of credit for having brought about this agreement. We of the minority, in our humble capacity, have endeavored as far as we could to cooperate. We could not cooperate, however, so far as the Clark amendment was concerned. Personally, I feel it is of very great importance that we have a very full expression of opinion on the part of the House as to the merits of this particular amendment which, as I previously stated, I will discuss in some detail later. When this bill was up for discussion originally there were many most desirable factors in the bill.

Mr. Speaker, the main purpose of the bill is to secure cooperation on the part of the Federal Government for old-age annuities, old-age pensions, and unemployment insurance. Those are the major factors of the bill, but there are also, if one might say, minor items as well as "window trimmings" to a certain extent which should be taken into consideration. We are aiding in the bill some old matters, namely, public health, vocational training, and maternal and child health.

Then we are setting up in this bill, Mr. Speaker, certain new provisions, namely, aid to dependent children, aid to crippled children, child-welfare services, and pensions for the blind. These are certainly all humanitarian movements and should be given our support.

So the minor items, to my mind, are most desirable, while the major items which I have read are in some respects undesirable. The attitude one must decide in voting for or against the final passage of this bill is whether it is desirable to secure these aids with respect to so-called "minor matters" by voting for other matters that you do not approve of. This leaves us in a very embarrassing position. I want to vote for all of these minor items. I want to vote against the major provisions, because I do not think personally they are matters that the Federal Government should undertake at this time, but, in general, I want to commend to my associates on this side of the House the results of the conference, and, for one, I am very pleased to assure my associates that I approve of the conference report and will gladly support it, aside from the disapproval which I have already stated in discussing the attitude of the majority on the so-called "Clark amendment."

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS].

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, not being a member of the conference committee, I can, with propriety and without being guilty of self-adulation, go further in saying nice things about the conferees than did my good friend, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], because he is a member of the conference committee.

I took a rather active part in the consideration of this important bill in the House and naturally I followed the work of the conferees closely and I may say to my colleagues on the Republican side that I think we have every reason to be proud of the fairness, candor, honesty, and persistency with which the majority members of the conference, as well as the minority members, pursued their duties in handling this important conference between Members of the House and Members of the Senate.

This is probably the most important and far-reaching measure we have considered in the Congress for many years. By this I mean that it deals with the very bread and butter of more people than probably any other measure that has been before Congress for many years. It deals with the poor and the aged and the blind and with nearly every stressful condition of life that may confront unfortunate people. It provides for the poor widow with her hapless brood of orphans; it seeks out the unfortunate youth whose home life is unhappy and who is irresistibly being drawn into the maelstrom of crime and lawlessness; it seeks to remove the dark cloud of poverty that has loomed up before the last days of many old people, and to plant instead a rainbow of hope that their last days might be happy. It will tell the poor blind man and woman, the most sorely afflicted of all our people, that henceforth they need not hold out their tin cups in their thin, emaciated hands, for the people of the greatest Nation in the world have realized that it is the duty of the fortunate to make provision for the unfortunate.

While this bill indicates an advance in public aid to unfortunates, I would have you realize that this bill is not to be considered as the gift of any person or any administration to these deserving people. Rather it is simply a recognition of the sentiment of the people of the Nation toward our unfortunates. It is a milestone marking the growth of civilization from the date of the first murder that we have any record of when a member of the first human family in defense of his foul deed said, "Am I my brother's keeper?" The human race has traveled far since then, but its course has generally been upward.

The conferees were required to assume the task of resolving 113 amendments. They have discharged this duty with tact and rare sagacity. The inconsequential amendments, such as those of diction and legislative terminology, were soon disposed of. Four or five were of major importance. One was the La Follette amendment. Another was the Russell amendment. Another was restoring authority to the social security board and not dividing it so as to put authority in the Secretary of Labor, where it should not be. Another is the Clark amendment, which has not as yet been composed between the conferees, and which will receive special consideration by the House yet today. Another was the amendment including the blind within the protection of the bill. I shall revert to that a little later. For fear I might forget, I should say to those of you who were interested in the question of the constitutionality of the provisions of this bill and who participated with us in the discussions when the bill was before the House that none of these numerous amendments changes the constitutionality of the bill in the least.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I should like to ask this question: Was this bill submitted to the Attorney General to determine whether it is constitutional or not?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I cannot answer the gentleman as to whether the conferees sought any advice of the Attorney General, and I have no desire to enter into a discussion of the constitutionality of the measure at all in the time allotted me.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. The gentleman will recall that that matter was discussed, and as a part of my remarks I inserted the opinion of the Assistant Solicitor General on the bill.

Mr. RICH. As amended?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. At the time it passed the House.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Yes; and I, too, referred to the uncertain and indefinite opinion of the Attorney General as to the constitutionality of certain titles of the bill, especially title 2 and title 8.

Mr. Speaker, for the remainder of my time I desire to address myself strictly to the amendment providing for relief to the blind. When this bill was up for consideration by the House I offered an amendment that would include the blind within the warm folds of the relief sections of this bill. This amendment was rejected, not on its merits or demerits but because the poor blind could be pushed aside by the young "brain trusters" who were fathering the bill at that time. The Membership of the House was favorable, but the partisan yoke was fitting much closer then than now. But the Senate has inserted an amendment providing relief for the blind in almost the exact language which was contained in my amendment. In effect the Senate adopted my amendment and the conferees have agreed to it. Those of you who were in favor of my amendment, and for whose assistance in that battle I was profoundly thankful, you may now assure your blind constituents that we have won the day and that they may feel that the flag of hope which they cannot see is flying high today. I thank the conferees in behalf of the thousands of poor blind who must grope their way through a dark world.

The Senate made only one material change in my amendment, and I wish to give them credit for it. This amendment provides that one need not be afflicted with permanent blindness in order to benefit under this law. One afflicted with temporary blindness may be included. This will be controlled by the State laws and the board in charge of the matter, who will issue regulations. Why should not a person 45 years of age, stricken with total blindness or temporary blindness for a few months or a few years, be entitled to the benefits of protection just as much as a man who has reached the age of 65 and who has the possession of his sight? Both need help if they have no means of support. To those of you who are friends of the blind, let me say that this amendment in itself will not give $15 a month to every needy, blind person in this country. Each State must pass some sort of legislation and must meet the requirements of this bill just the same as the States must meet the requirements of the bill with respect to the aged and the widows and the children in need. Each State must come forward with some constructive legislation that will match the requirements of the Federal Government in order that the blind people in your State may be taken care of.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I shall be pleased to yield.

Mr. MAY. I want to get one matter of information that the gentleman, no doubt, can give me. As I understand this measure as a whole, it is predicated upon the idea of participation by the States with the Federal Government.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Absolutely.

Mr. MAY. Is there any provision whereby in the States, when they fail to comply with the requirements of the Federal Government, the pensioners in that State can be taken care of by the Federal Government?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. No. In old age and blind relief the Government contributes only when the State matches the Government. There are some provisions in this bill which provide for Federal contribution without State matching such as health and sanitation relief, but in all the major provisions of this bill State participation is a necessary condition precedent to Government participation. The philosophy of this plan is to put the administration of this class of relief upon the States and thereby hold it as close to the people as possible. This class of relief is close to the hearts of the people. They should be permitted to administer it under close and strictly drawn regulations. This relief to the blind is intended to make them self-sustaining and to encourage them to feel that they are not unwelcome, but on the other hand that they are recognized as a part of our citizenship and are entitled to encouragement to help balance the natural handicap under which they are constantly placed. The Savior of man had compassion for the blind. Man himself has sympathy for the blind. This bill permits this sympathy to take tangible form. It transforms sympathy into money, which is a very practical guaranty for happiness. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I should like to discuss for a minute the parliamentary situation and the question before us insofar as the Russell amendment is concerned. I do not agree to all that was said by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL] as to the effect of the amendment proposed by the conferees. Neither do I agree to the procedure we are following which deprives the House of the right to a separate vote on an amendment as vital as the Russell amendment.

The question presented here is that we must vote the report up or down before the House can express itself as to whether or not they want to adopt and retain the Russell amendment. If we vote the conference report down a motion can then be presented to recede and concur in the Senate amendment, the Russell amendment, which is so vital to some of the States, including Arkansas. If the report is adopted we cannot have a vote on the Russell amendment. Such procedure is not right and in order for us to try to obtain justice for the aged we should vote the conference report down.

It is said that the amendment proposed by the conferees requires contribution on the part of some agency in the State where the State constitution prohibits the passage of participation laws.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. It does require the payment.

Mr. MILLER. Where is it so provided?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Because we did not take it out.

Mr. MILLER. Look at the conference report at the bottom of page 1. It says, "In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert the following." What does "lieu" mean?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The bill, section 3, page 4, provides:

> From the sums appropriated therefor the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay to each State which has an approved plan for old-age assistance, for each quarter, beginning with the quarter commencing July 1, 1935, an amount which shall be used exclusively as old-age assistance equal to one-half of the total of the sum expended during such quarter as old-age assistance under the State plan with respect to each individual—

And so forth. We do not relieve somebody in the State from putting up the money.

Mr. MILLER. The only agency that could put up anything is the State itself.

The gentleman says that there are a few States in the Union who could not comply because of the constitutional provisions. I do not know how many States there are, but I understand Georgia is one of them. The contention I make is that if a contribution from the Federal Government is justified, it ought to go to all States alike and should not be dependent upon the constitutional provisions of a State nor upon its present ability to match the Federal funds.

They say it is a question of Federal aid or Federal pension. I do not care what you term it. There is no justification for discriminating against a citizen of Oklahoma or Arkansas or anywhere else in favor of a citizen in any other State. This Federal money is being contributed by the Federal Government, and it ought to go to all of the citizens who are eligible, and we ought to have a right to a separate vote as to whether or not we will accept the Russell amendment and thus do justice to all citizens regardless of where they may live.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. What have those States the gentleman mentions done within the last 6 months to remove these constitutional obstacles?

Mr. MILLER. I can speak only for Arkansas. We have passed laws to raise money, even to a sales tax.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. What has your State done with regard to the constitutional prohibition?

Mr. MILLER. We have no constitutional prohibition against the enactment of old-age pension laws, and we have enacted such laws, but I know that our eligibles in Arkansas will not receive the sum of $15 a month from the Federal Government, because our State will not be able to match the funds to that extent. We may be able to make some contribution, but it will be small, and I think we should have the time allowed under the amendment in which to place our State finances in shape to meet the requirements, so that our eligibles in Arkansas will receive the same amount of Federal money as is received by any citizen of any other State. That is all that the Russell amendment does, and it is fair, right, and just, and we should adopt it, or rather should agree to it, as passed by the Senate.

It is not pleasing for me to have to call the attention of the House to the fact that Arkansas will not be able to pay its eligibles a pension of $15 per month, but I am more concerned in obtaining a pension for our aged than I am in reciting to you the wonderful natural resources that are within our State, because our aged cannot live on these undeveloped natural resources, and they being citizens of the United States are entitled as a matter of right and justice to the same amounts as are citizens living in more populous and wealthy States, and the only way for this discrimination to be avoided now is to adopt the Russell amendment.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FULLER].

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, I realize that some of the States are facing a hard proposition to raise money with which to match Federal aid for old-age pensions. I realize that my State is going to be in that condition, but my State has no more rights than any other State in this Union. If Arkansas cannot comply with this law, God knows it ought not to complain and begrudge other States of the benefit. This is equal and just to all. Not only that, but Arkansas can and will comply with this law, and in a substantial manner.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. Does the gentleman think that Arkansas is able to contribute $15 a month to the eligibles under this bill?

Mr. FULLER. It may not be able to contribute that much, but it does not have to contribute any designated amount. The Federal Government contributes and matches any amount paid by Arkansas as a pension up to $15 per month.

Mr. MILLER. What does the gentleman think that Arkansas can contribute?

Mr. FULLER. Statistics show that Arkansas has 75,000 people over 65 years of age and that less than 15 percent of these are eligible for pensions. At $10 per person, it would mean that Arkansas would be required to raise $1,300,000, which amount, being matched by the Federal Government, would pay an average pension of $20 each. The recent legislature of our State provided for practically $1,000,000 for this purpose and we can and will raise what is necessary to take care of the eligibles who are in need over 65 years of age. If it should develop that we cannot raise $10 per person, we can reduce our contribution. In some localities, as is true everywhere, many have never made as much, on an average, as $10 a month in cash and could very well get along with much less than $30 per month. It is true, however, in cities, where rent must be paid, a larger pension should be allowed. This measure is all based upon need, and it is not contemplated that the State and Federal Governments will provide better living conditions than these people have enjoyed during their lives. We cannot afford to kill thrift and ambition. We cannot afford to take the attitude simply because one is 65 years of age that they are going to remain on "flowery beds of ease" by reason of a big pension; this is based wholly and entirely on the theory of helping those who cannot help themselves and can never be construed anything else than a dole.

Mr. MILLER. Do I understand the gentleman to say that a citizen 65 years of age is not entitled to as much as $10 a month?

Mr. FULLER. I want to say that nobody, simply because 65 years of age, is entitled to any money as a pension; the Government owes no real obligation to give anybody a pension.

Mr. KELLER. Why not? Why are we doing it?

Mr. FULLER. Not as a governmental, legal, or financial duty, but as a humanitarian, social-welfare act to take care of the unfortunate needy—those who cannot take care of themselves.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The legislatures of the respective States will determine the amount of the pension and those who are eligible.

Mr. FULLER. Certainly.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Is it the gentleman's interpretation of this amendment, in the form reported by the conferees, that if Arkansas should make no contribution, Arkansas will get nothing?

Mr. FULLER. That is right. There are a few States in the Union, two, possibly three, which have a prohibition in their constitutions against using money for this particular purpose. They want until January 1, 1937, to correct this condition, so they can participate and get money for this purpose and receive aid from the Nation. We grant those States that request, with the provision that while the State itself cannot match the Federal money, they cannot get any money for that State unless a county or a municipality or some particular subdivision of the government matches the Federal money. None of this Federal money can go to a State unless matched by the State or a subdivision thereof. I am sorry to have to differ with my colleagues, but I am really chagrined to hear them talk about Arkansas being poverty stricken. Arkansas is not poverty stricken. Arkansas, in natural resources, is one of the most wonderful and rich States in the Union. [Applause.]

I have devoted a greater portion of my life exclaiming the grandeurs and virtues, wealth and undeveloped resources of my State. We proudly boast of Arkansas as the "Wonder State", and I cannot pass unchallenged the statement that we cannot do what other States in the Union can and will do.

In the last few years we have had unprecedented floods and droughts; in addition, we have had a financial depression which is common all over the country. Without these catastrophes we would not be seeking or accepting relief at the hands of the Federal Government. Arkansas is ready, able, and willing, and will, in a substantial way, contribute its portion and take care of its needy over 65 years of age.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. FULLER. We ought not to have any benefit from the Federal Treasury if we do not do our own part. The God's truth of the matter is Arkansas has received approximately $300,000,000 under this relief program and has paid only a few millions into the Federal Treasury as income taxes. What has happened in my State has happened in a great proportion of the other States of the Union. The time has come when we have to protect the Federal Treasury. We have already gone too far in appropriations for various relief. The time has come to call a halt. This dole must stop and give the country time to recover. I never thought I would live to see the day when the Federal Government would take the taxpayers' money to pay pensions to the aged; but the time has come, the emergency is here, and we might as well face it. We ought to perform this duty fairly, justly, and equitably, to all alike, and no State or any class of people are entitled to preference over any other. I have no sympathy with the argument that the Federal Government ought to bear all the burden and pay everyone a pension of a certain age and take care of everyone wanting relief. The true test should be to help the needy, those who cannot help themselves, and carry out the spirit of the Good Samaritan and to perform our duty to our neighbor who is in distress.

Every State seeking relief in the way of a pension for its citizens should match what the Federal Government is willing to pay. I realize that in the future we will hear of people running for Congress on the platform that the States should not pay any of this obligation but the Federal Government should pay it all, and in an amount possibly up to $200 a month. But we all realize that is only political propaganda for the purpose of obtaining office and that it is a burden the Government cannot possibly bear.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER. I yield.

Mr. GIFFORD. The gentleman made the statement that there are many people in the State of Arkansas who never averaged $10 a month. Last year, under Mr. Hopkins, were they not paid the usual 45 cents an hour, and have they not made more than $10 a month?

Mr. FULLER. Yes. That is true, although those able to work and make more were only paid about $19 per month. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FULLER] has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. NICHOLS].

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I am satisfied the House, when it comes to a vote, is going to do the usual thing and adopt the conference report suggested by the conferees; but you be just advised of what you are doing. There are 18 States in the United States that will not get one cent of the money provided for under this bill.

The distinguished gentlemen of the committee say that no State should be permitted to have any of this money unless they match the money. Well, why not? Where does this money come from? It comes from Federal taxation, does it not? When you gather that money, when you get Federal taxes, you go into every State in the United States and you take it from every individual in the United States. There are no boundary lines; there are no geographical subdivisions which you exempt from the payment of taxes. You collect Federal taxes from all over the United States alike. What is this? This is paying back to people in a certain class the benefits derived from Federal taxes. Then why, in the name of common sense, should you, when you get ready to pay back the benefits of government derived from Federal taxes, set up geographical boundaries or State lines and say, "Old man or old woman, 65 years of age or more, if you live in a State where the constitution will not permit that State to raise funds to match Federal funds, or if you live in a State where the legislature will not pass legislation to permit the State to meet the funds of the Federal Government, or if you live in a State whose ad valorem valuation is so low that they cannot raise money from taxation, then, old man and old woman, American citizen though you may be, old man and old woman, though you have always paid your Federal taxes, because you live in that kind of a State you will be discriminated against by the Federal Government when it gets ready to pass back to the people the benefits of government that you yourselves have helped to build up by the collection and gathering of Federal taxes"? [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. NICHOLS] has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERGUSON].

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Speaker, sometime ago I wrote every Member of this body explaining the fact that in the Senate was inserted an amendment by Senator RUSSELL that would allow the Social Security Act to actually pay a pension. I urged the Membership of the House to watch this bill closely and vote with me to make this bill actually pay a pension. Now is the time to take this action. I talked to many of you personally on this matter. Now we can keep our word and pass a bill to pay a pension.

You Members who are going home to States where people are not going to receive any pension are going to regret that this day you did not vote down the conference report, with instructions that the Russell amendment be retained. What are you going to do with the people who are writing you every day asking, "When are we going to get the money under President Roosevelt's social-security bill?" That is going to be a hard question to answer. If we are going to take the attitude that the committee has taken, that $15 a month will bankrupt the Treasury, then this bill is indicted as not being in good faith, because it permits that much if the States will match it. Sometime we are going to be liable for $15 a month, if the States are able to do what the Federal Government says they can do. We are not asking for a perpetual proposition. For a period of 2 years, under the Russell amendment, States can participate and the people will actually get a pension check, which they will not get under this law as drawn. [Applause.]

In my opinion, under this bill the people of Oklahoma will not receive pensions for at least a year—until such time as we vote to revise our constitution and levy taxes with which to match the funds from the Government. I hope the Membership of this House will not be misled by the substitute offered for the Russell amendment. This substitute only gives other local agencies than the State power to match Government funds until July 1, 1937. I hope, and my firm conviction is, that we will recognize that this is our last opportunity at this session of Congress to actually pay the old people of the Nation in the States that are not qualified to match Government funds, a pension. Let us vote down this conference report and instruct our conferees to accept the Russell amendment as incorporated in the Senate bill, and actually accept the responsibility of paying our old people a pension immediately on the passage of this bill. I shall be severely disappointed if we vote to accept the bill as recommended by the conferees. I know that I shall have to tell the people entitled to a pension in my State that I failed in my efforts to get them the pension they so justly deserve. I am willing to accept the challenge and work on this proposition until the old people of my district are actually receiving pensions.

In the short time allotted me by the Ways and Means Committee I am unable to make my position clear. I am afraid the Membership of the House does not fully understand the position of many States that will receive no pensions. I also fully realize that the efforts on the part of a few Members here today will be of little effect against the powerful political prestige of the Ways and Means Committee. On the whole, I think the Committee has done a good job; but in this I believe they neglected their duty to see that every qualified person in the United States should actually receive a pension. It is with little hope that I urge you to vote for this amendment in the face of such political prestige, but at least I have the satisfaction of stating my convictions on the floor of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERGUSON] has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION].

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, we have before us for consideration the conference report on H. R. 7260, to provide old-age pensions, and so forth.

This is President Roosevelt's bill, but has been materially amended in the Senate. It came up for consideration in the House on April 15, and at that time I made a speech during the general debate pointing out that the age limit was too high, and that the President's bill provided no relief for the needy blind or needy crippled people and the inadequacy of the amount and because of the constitutional provisions and financial conditions of many States—the States would not be able to match the Government's money and this would deny pensions to the needy old people in many States and in my State. I also pointed out the inadequacy of the appropriation, and that the amount carried in the bill would not provide more than 80 cents per month for needy old persons in the United States. While the bill was still under consideration, and on April 18, 1935, I offered an amendment (1) to fix the minimum age at 60 years instead of 65, as provided in the President's bill, (2) to provide the same amount of pension for the needy blind and needy cripples as to the needy old people, (3) my amendment also provided that the Government should pay $25 per month to aged needy persons, needy blind persons, and needy crippled persons in the United States without waiting for any contribution from the States.

This amendment was strongly urged by me, because people 60 years of age or over, under our modern system of machinery and efficiency cannot find gainful employment. People who are poor and blind, or poor and crippled, need a pension just as much as old people. I pointed out that the President's bill provided that no needy old person could get a pension until the States should first pass laws, collect taxes, and match the Government's money. I emphasized the fact that the constitution of many States would have to be changed, and the financial condition of many States was such that the States, including Kentucky, would not be able for a long period of time, if at all, to match the Government's money, and therefore, these needy old people in Kentucky and other States similarly situated would be denied any pension. These needy old, needy blind, and needy crippled people have to have help now, and my amendment provided that the Federal Government, on the passage of this act, should pay each one of them $25 per month, at least until July 1937, and gives the States time to change their constitutions, pass new laws, and match the Government's money, but the President and the Democratic leaders of the House were opposed to any such amendment, and with their big Democratic majority they were able to defeat my amendment.

The President's bill went to the Senate. The Senate amended President Roosevelt's bill in many particulars. Senator Russell offered and secured an amendment to the bill in the Senate, which provided that the Federal Government would pay a pension to needy persons 65 years of age, or over, until July 1, 1937, without requiring the State to match the Federal Government's money, but in no event could this pension exceed $15 per month.

INDIANS AND ESKIMOS PREFERRED

The Senate adopted another amendment authorizing the payment of $30 per month to Indians and Eskimos who had attained the age of 65 years, and whose income was less than $1 per day, and also provided a pension for Indians or Eskimos who are blind and under 65 years of age the sum of $10 per month. This would not require any matching and will be paid to these Indians and Eskimos when this measure is enacted into law. I am at a loss to understand why this great preference should be shown to Indians and Eskimos as against white or colored citizens of the United States. If Indians or Eskimos 65 years of age require $30 per month, and Indians and Eskimos less than 65 years of age, who are blind, require $10 per month, I cannot understand why aged needy white and colored American citizens 65 years of age and blind persons should not receive equal consideration with the Indians and Eskimos.

CONFEREES CHANGED SENATE AMENDMENT

After the bill passed the Senate, as is provided by the rules of the House and Senate, this measure was sent to conference. The conferees are made up of 5 Members of the House and 5 of the Senate. It is their business to try to reconcile the differences in the bill as passed by the House and as passed by the Senate.

The conferees modified the Senate amendment as to old-age pensions for white and colored citizens, but not as to Indians and Eskimos, and they have submitted a conference report setting forth this change, which is as follows:

Which provides that the State plan for old-age assistance, in order to be approved by the Board, need not provide for financial participation before July 1, 1937, by the State, in the case of any State which the Board, upon application by the State and after reasonable notice and opportunity for hearing to the State, finds is prevented by its constitution from providing such financial participation.

As I understand this amendment as submitted in the conference report, the Senate amendment providing for as much as $15 per month to needy people 65 years of age or over without State participation is wiped out. Under this conference amendment the Federal Government can only pay a pension to needy people 65 years of age without State participation if the constitution of such State prohibits the State from collecting taxes to provide for old-age pensions. If there is nothing in the constitution of a State prohibiting such State from collecting taxes for old-age pensions, then it must do so and match the Government's money before the Government can contribute any amount to any needy old person in such State. In other words, unless the constitution of Kentucky prohibits the State of Kentucky from collecting taxes for old-age pensions, Kentucky must levy and collect taxes and match the Government's money before anyone in Kentucky can get an old-age pension. On the other hand, if the constitution of Kentucky prohibits the collection of a tax for old-age pensions, then under this amendment submitted by the conferees' report, the Federal Government could pay to needy people in Kentucky, 65 years of age or over, and who are not confined in any institution, a pension not to exceed $15 per month.

I regret very much that this involved amendment was put into this bill. It should have remained as the Senate passed it, which provided that the Federal Government, until July 1, 1937, could pay a pension amounting to as much as $15 per month to needy people 65 years of age and over without State participation. Under the conferees' amendment it must now be debated and argued and decided whether or not the constitution of Kentucky prohibits the State of Kentucky from collecting a tax for old-age pensions. Nothing can be done to relieve the needy old people of Kentucky until this is decided, and if it should be decided that the constitution of Kentucky does not prohibit Kentucky from collecting taxes to match the Government's money for old-age pensions, then nothing can be done, and there will be no help for the aged needy in Kentucky until Kentucky passes laws, collects taxes, and matches the Government's money.

These old people need help now, and they need it very much; and I am deeply grieved that my amendment was not adopted. If it had been adopted, in a short time each needy person in Kentucky 60 years of age or over, each needy blind person, and each needy crippled person would begin receiving $25 per month.

STATE MUST MATCH FEDERAL MONEY

As I have heretofore pointed out, unless the constitution of Kentucky prohibits the collection of taxes to match the Federal money, no needy old person in Kentucky will receive any pension for a considerable time yet. This is true as to needy blind people. There is no provision in the bill for needy crippled people. The House and Senate both turned down my amendment on that, but the Senate did put in an amendment authorizing the payment of pensions to needy blind people, provided the State puts up a like sum.

This bill provides that the Government will match State money, one for two, for pensions for dependent children, needy widows, and needy orphans. This is also true as to vocational training and the public health. Unless the State of Kentucky comes along and passes laws, sets up an organization, and collects taxes to match the Federal money, this legislation will mean nothing to the needy old people, the needy blind people, needy widows, orphans, or dependent children in Kentucky, and this is true as to vocational training for crippled people.

Every citizen of every State in the Union, directly or indirectly, pays taxes into the United States Treasury. The rich States like Pennsylvania and New York, Massachusetts, Ohio, Illinois, and so forth, have provided old-age-pension systems and they are able to match the Federal funds. I am afraid that Kentucky and many other States similarly situated might not be able to match the Federal funds, and therefore we will have the spectacle of the people in the rich States receiving old-age-pension money from the Government and the people in the poor States (where they need the pensions the most) not able to meet the Government's money and not receiving any money from the Government to pay pensions.

As I have pointed out, the people of the poor States will be paying money into the Treasury to provide pensions for those living in the rich States but will themselves receive no pension benefits, and it was this and other circumstances that led me to offer and strongly urge my amendment for the Federal Government to pay each needy old person, each needy blind person, and each needy crippled person $25 per month without it being matched by the State. In this way, each and every needy old, needy blind, and needy crippled citizen of the United States would be treated alike and the Federal Government would not show any partiality among its citizens; and furthermore I know that these classes of people needed help in these terrible times of depression and they need it now and perhaps will never need it so much as they need it now.

I voted for this bill because it was the best bill we had a chance to vote for. Some day we hope to help amend this law so that it may do substantial justice to all American citizens and so that it will at least not give preference to Indians and Eskimos over white and colored citizens.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON].

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, those of us who are concerned with legislation affecting the people of this country are, and should be, happy that this legislation is drawing near a conclusion.

Some 20 or more years ago, when a great ocean liner struck an iceberg and it became apparent that all could not be saved, our country was thrilled with the heroic utterance and obedience to the order, "Women and children first." Heroes went to watery graves to carry out this order.

Last year, in June, I think, the President of the United States sent a historic message to the Congress in which he said that with all the hazards and vicissitudes of this modern life, the first objective of government should be security for men, women, and children. A second message came to this Congress on January 17 of this year, asking us to give immediate consideration to this problem of social security.

As a member of the Ways and Means Committee, I shall always be proud of the hours and days I have spent assisting in the preparation of this bill. Let me say to the conferees that, regardless of the work they may do in the future, their work upon this bill will be a star in their crowns. They have brought back to the House of Representatives a real social-security bill. Let me say to the membership of this House that of all the votes you will ever cast, even though there may be certain parts of it with which you do not agree, I predict that you will always be happy and proud of your vote and your participation in this great social-security program.

For the first time in the history of this Nation and in the most comprehensive social program that was ever formulated by a legislative body, unfortunate people are cared for. Unfortunate mothers, unfortunate children, unfortunate blind, unfortunate crippled, unfortunate unemployed, unfortunate aged. In the category of the unfortunates who will be cared for under this legislation we start at the cradle and go to the grave. It is a wonderful program, a program benefiting the people of this country.

There may be those who will say that certain changes should be made, but remember, my friends, every dollar that goes to the unfortunates under this bill will be an additional dollar, one dollar more, to go to them than they would receive without this legislation. It is a great humanitarian program, a program looking toward benefits to people, providing security, social security, to our unfortunates, from the cradle to the grave.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment in disagreement.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the amendments in disagreement, nos. 17, 67, 68, 83, and 84, be considered en bloc.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments, as follows:

Amendment no. 17: On page 16, after line 17, insert the following:

"(7) Service performed in the employ of an employer who has in operation a plan providing annuities to employees which is certified by the Board as having been approved by it under section 702, if the employee performing such service has elected to come under such plan; except that if any such employee withdraws from the plan before he attains the age of 65, or if the Board withdraws its approval of the plan, the service performed while the employee was under such plan as approved shall be construed to be employment as defined in this subsection."

Amendment no. 68: On page 45, after line 9, insert the following:

"(b) The Board shall receive applications from employers who desire to operate private annuity plans with a view to providing benefits in lieu of the benefits otherwise provided for in title II of this act, and the Board shall approve any such plan and issue a certificate of such approval if it finds that such plan meets the following requirements:

"(1) The plan shall be available, without limitation as to age, to any employee who elects to come under such plan: Provided, That no employer shall make election to come or remain under the plan a condition precedent to the securing or retention of employment.

"(2) The benefits payable at retirement and the conditions as to retirement shall not be less favorable, based upon accepted actuarial principles, than those provided for under section 202.

"(3) The contributions of the employee and the employer shall be deposited with a life-insurance company, an annuity organization, or a trustee, approved by the Board.

"(4) Termination of employment shall constitute withdrawal from the plan.

"(5) Upon the death of an employee, his estate shall receive an amount not less than the amount it would have received if the employee had been entitled to receive benefits under title II of this act.

"(c) The Board shall have the right to call for such reports from the employer and to make such inspections of his records as will satisfy it that the requirements of subsection (b) are being met, and to make such regulations as will facilitate the operation of such private annuity plans in conformity with such requirements.

"(d) The Board shall withdraw its approval of any such plan upon the request of the employer, or if it finds that the plan or any action taken thereunder fails to meet the requirements of subsection (b)."

Amendment no. 83: On page 55, after line 17, insert the following:

"(7) Service performed by an employee before he attains the age of 65 in the employ of an employer who has in operation a plan providing annuities to employees which is certified by the Board as having been approved by it under section 702, if the employee has elected to come under such plan, and if the Commissioner of Internal Revenue determines that the aggregate annual contributions of the employee and the employer under such plan as approved are not less than the taxes which would otherwise be payable under sections 801 and 804, and that the employer pays an amount at least equal to 50 percent of such taxes: Provided, That if any such employee withdraws from the plan before he attains the age of 65, or if the Board withdraws its approval of the plan, there shall be paid by the employer to the Treasurer of the United States, in such manner as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe, an amount equal to the taxes which would otherwise have been payable by the employer and the employee on account of such service, together with interest on such amount at 3 percent per annum compounded annually."

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, before amendment no. 84 is read, may I ask the chairman of the committee if 84 is not a separate matter from the so-called "Clark amendment"? In other words, it is the Black amendment. As I understood it, we were to have up for consideration the Clark amendment only, whereas this is an amendment to the Clark amendment, known in conference as the "Black amendment." I would ask that this be taken up separately. This was not given very much consideration.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The Black amendment, which is amendment no. 84, would have no place in the picture at all if it were not for the Clark amendment. It is an amendment to the Clark amendment. It all goes together. You cannot separate them.

Mr. TREADWAY. I realize it is an amendment to the Clark amendment, but the Clark amendment itself stops in the middle of page 56.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. If the Clark amendment should fail there would be nothing at all to which the Black amendment could attach itself, so it is so inseparably connected with the Clark amendment that the two cannot be separated.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, is it not fair to inquire whether or not the Black amendment, so called, should not be further brought up in conference in order to straighten out what appears to be an unfortunate situation in the prohibition language that it carries? As I understand it, this prevents the director of any insurance company being connected with any of these boards.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I think the gentleman will agree with me that you cannot find any status or excuse on earth for the Black amendment without the Clark amendment.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I shall move that the House disagree to the Senate amendment.

Mr. TREADWAY. That is my point; if the Black amendment should not go back with the Clark amendment to conference.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Certainly.

Mr. TREADWAY. If that is the situation, it is entirely satisfactory to me. Mr. Speaker, I understand now that the so-called "Black amendment" shall further be considered by the conferees with the Clark amendment.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. No; we are considering it right now in conjunction with the Clark amendment, because it is a part of that amendment, and you cannot separate the two. It has nothing to which to attach itself without the Clark amendment.

Mr. TREADWAY. The Clark amendment could be amended?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Certainly not. It is a part of the Clark amendment. The Clark amendment with the Black amendment constitutes the full Clark amendment.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Amendment no. 84 is in disagreement. The House has either to agree or disagree to it, and I understand the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina will be to disagree to amendment no. 84, along with the other amendments that are known, strictly speaking, as the "Clark amendment."

Mr. TREADWAY. If amendments nos. 82 and 83 go back to conference, would that include amendment no. 84?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Under the unanimous consent that was presented and agreed to.

Mr. TREADWAY. Eighty-four is inseparable from 82 and 83; therefore, it would go back to conference?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Yes; en bloc.

Mr. DOUGHTON. They are to be considered and acted upon en bloc.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the Senate amendments, as follows:

Amendment no. 84: On page 56, after line 12, insert the following:

"SEC. 812. (a) It shall be unlawful for any employer to make with any insurance company, annuity organization or trustee any contract with respect to carrying out a private annuity plan approved by the Board under section 702, if any director, officer, employee, or shareholder of the employer is at the same time a director, officer, employee, or shareholder of the insurance company, annuity organization or trustee.

"(b) It shall be unlawful for any person, whether employer or insurance company, annuity organization or trustee, to knowingly offer, grant, or give, or solicit, accept, or receive, any rebate against the charges payable under any contract carrying out a private annuity plan approved by the Board under section 702.

"(c) Every insurance company, annuity organization or trustee, who makes any contract with any employer for carrying out a private annuity plan of such employer which has been approved by the Board under section 702, shall make, keep, and preserve for such periods, such accounts, correspondence, memoranda, papers, books, and other records with respect to such contract and the financial transactions of such company, organization, or trustee as the Board may deem necessary to ensure the proper carrying out of such contract and to prevent fraud and collusion. All such accounts, correspondence, memoranda, papers, books, and other records shall be subject at any time, and from time to time, to such reasonable periodic, special, and other examinations by the Board as the Board may prescribe.

"(d) Any person violating any provision of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or both."

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendments which have just been reported by the Clerk.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I offer a preferential motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers a preferential motion, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Preferential motion offered by Mr. TREADWAY: Mr. TREADWAY moves to recede and concur in Senate amendments nos. 17, 67, 68, 83, and 84.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina, the chairman of the committee, means the taking out of the bill which is now under consideration the so-called "Clark amendment."

My motion to recede and concur, which is a preferential motion, means the inclusion of the Clark amendment.

The failure to include the idea in the Clark amendment in the original bill and the failure of the House conferees to concur in the action of the Senate and include the Clark amendment is another indication of the present-day intention of the administration to endeavor to control all business procedure. It is another indication of the concentration in Washington in the hands of the present administration of control over business scattered all over this land.

The Clark amendment was adopted in the other body by a vote of 51 to 35, thus demonstrating its strong sentiment in favor of the purpose which the amendment seeks to accomplish. The proposition was fully discussed from all angles, and all the objections that can possibly be brought forth here were made there.

What is the intent of the Clark amendment? Simply to permit business concerns that for many years have had pension systems of their own, contributed to by employees and employers alike or entirely by employers, to continue this system without the penalty of additional taxation to support some other people's employees; and if we fail to adopt the Clark amendment we penalize these people to the extent that either these private pension systems must be liquidated or else the employers and employees must contribute twice, once to their own system and also to the Government system.

I do not want to ascribe any unfair ideas to the administration, but I think this well illustrates what we have been reading about so frequently in the press in recent times of the desire on the part of those in control of the administration to create an attitude of hostility or opposition to our constitutional government. This is the question involved here, as I see it. We are treading on the thinnest kind of ice when we pass certain features of this bill at all. We have not been able to secure from the judicial authorities of the Government, the Attorney General or others, a definite opinion that this bill will be declared constitutional.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I am sure the gentleman will recall, upon reflection, that the Assistant Solicitor General of the United States appeared before the committee in executive session and presented an opinion of some 11 pages, and in my remarks on the bill when it passed the House I included this opinion as a part of my remarks, and it is in the RECORD.

Mr. TREADWAY. Very good; I admit all that, and I still say that the Attorney General's Department has failed to positively say they could support the constitutionality of this bill. This certainly has also been the attitude of the judicial authorities in the conference. There is no question about the very shaky position of the judicial authorities that appeared the other day before the conferees.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. If the Supreme Court should declare this act unconstitutional and in the meantime if employers should liquidate their pension funds, then what will happen to the empoyees who now receive protection under private pension funds?

Mr. TREADWAY. They will be absolutely out of luck. They will have neither one nor the other and there is no question about that.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. REED of New York. And there are some 3,000,000 of them, are there not?

Mr. TREADWAY. As I understand it, the record shows there are 600 private pension funds in various business concerns throughout the country, and as the gentleman from New York states, they employ in the neighborhood of 3,000,000 people who will be absolutely deprived of the protection for which they have been paying over a long period of years.

Mr. REED of New York. And 300 of those private concerns have reserves of over $700,000,000.

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes; and the Clark amendment calls for the approval of the investment of these funds by the new Social Security Board. The Social Security Board absolutely controls the investment of the private funds. The only thing it does not do is to take them away from the private companies. There must be approval by this new Social Security Board of the investment of these private funds.

Mr. REED of New York. And is it not a fact that many of these large concerns were pioneers in this field and had to take a loss resulting from a long period of experiment in order to properly build up this system?

Mr. TREADWAY. Not only that, if I may interrupt my colleague, but when their business was poor and was not paying as they hoped it might, they nevertheless protected their employees with this sort of fund.

Mr. REED of New York. And is it not also a fact that the benefits given by many of these companies are far greater than what they will get from the Government?

Mr. TREADWAY. I was expecting to refer to that very feature. The Clark amendment provides that the benefits from the private insurance funds must be as good or better than those provided for in this bill. Is not that correct?

Mr. REED of New York. That is correct.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. WOOD. The gentleman just stated that if this law were declared unconstitutional, the people who are now covered by private insurance funds would lose the many millions of dollars they had paid in.

Mr. TREADWAY. No; I did not say they would lose it. Those funds would be liquidated and not lost. However, they would lose the benefit of their anticipated retirement annuities.

Mr. WOOD. The fact of the matter is the employers do not pay into these old-age pension funds operated by private companies except by less wages.

Mr. TREADWAY. Oh, they do; the employers and employees both contribute under one form and the employees only under another form. The gentleman is mistaken about that feature.

Now, I want to refer to some features of this debate. Let me quote from the author of this amendment—Senator CLARK. Senator CLARK said:

> The purpose of the amendment is to permit companies which have or may establish private pension plans, which are at least equally favorable or more favorable to the employee than the plan set up under the provisions of the bill as a Government plan, to be exempted from the provisions of the bill and to continue the operation of the private plan provided it meets the requirements of the amendment and is approved by the board set up by the bill itself.

There is the gist of the Clark amendment.

Mr. REED of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Certainly.

Mr. REED of New York. If it is not agreed to by the House, of necessity the private pension plans will either have to be liquidated or the employers will have to pay double rates.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. The gentleman from Massachusetts is sure that the employers would not continue to contribute to both?

Mr. TREADWAY. No; that is hardly to be expected.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. If the Clark amendment is not accepted it means the liquidation of the fund.

Mr. TREADWAY. I should assume so.

(The time of Mr. TREADWAY having expired, Mr. DOUGHTON yielded him 10 minutes more.)

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. KELLER. If these people pay double, they get double service.

Mr. TREADWAY. Oh, no; I beg the gentleman's pardon. They would not get but one service.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. For a question.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Statistics will show how many of the 600 pensions are holding companies?

Mr. TREADWAY. Oh, I do not know anything about that.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If the question should arise and these were holding companies and they should be decentralized, then what would be the status of the employees—those insured? Assuming that they are not holding companies, what would be the status of the employees at any time?

Mr. TREADWAY. Those assets are in a separate fund, entirely separate from the business carried on by the company. They are under the approval of the new Security Board.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The amount deposited would be, but would they not at that point be in the same status as at the present time, when it is proposed to liquidate them, in the event that this amendment does not carry?

Mr. TREADWAY. If these companies are liquidated and you are an employee of one of these private corporations you would receive your pro rata share in the liquidation, but you would have no further protection under that private system for your old-age insurance, which now you would have.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. THURSTON. Is there any provision in the bill which would defer liquidation of these plans until the bill is declared constitutional?

Mr. TREADWAY. No. The adoption of the majority motion to insist upon disagreement and strike out the Clark amendment, as I say, sets up the situation which the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. CHRISTIANSON] just referred to. You will either pay double or you are out of luck. As I said in answer to a question of the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] there are 600 of these private-plan insurance boards in operation, covering 3,000,000 employees. Three hundred of these covering a million employees are on a reserve basis, with over $700,000,000 of reserve, and still, without the Clark amendment, we are forcing the liquidation of those companies.

Approximately 150,000 employees are now drawing pensions under private plans, and the average of those who share under the contributory plan is $84 per month and the noncontributory $59 per month.

Mr. KNUTSON. And the gentleman will recall a number of us in committee sought to have a similar provision incorporated in the original bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. I mentioned that at the opening of my remarks. This was brought up in committee and originally voted down, showing the desire, as I stated before, to place all this control of business in the hands of Government officials, who are inexperienced in business—and we know who they are, we know who are going to control this proposition—who have never had a bit of experience in business methods.

Mr. KNUTSON. Some of them hardly dry behind the ears.

Mr. TREADWAY. Now for some of the advantages of the private plans. More liberal benefits are paid. Employees get credit for past service, while under the Federal plan you start in anew. Employees 60 years of age are provided for under the private plan, whereas under the Federal plan they are not. Annuities are paid in true proportion to earnings and service, whereas under the Federal benefit rate they are arbitrary. Many private plans permit joint annuities, giving protection to widows, something not included here.

Mr. Speaker, there is no abler man, perhaps, or better constitutional lawyer in the Senate than the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE]. Let me quote what he stated in the Senate. He said:

> If the Court looks through mere form to the substance of this bill, I assert again that the question of the validity of the bill is one which no responsible lawyer would undertake to say is not in serious question. Hence, why strike down, with the probably unconstitutional bill, the private pension systems and private benefit systems granting benefits to the employees of employers of this country, embracing a large part of our population—why strike those down when a bill is proposed which probably will not pass the muster of the courts?

It seems to me the experience of the past few weeks in getting decisions on the constitutionality of legislation that has been passed by this Congress and the previous Congress, ought to be a caution, an SOS signal to the people who are forcing what is undoubtedly in the opinion of many able lawyers unconstitutional legislation in the provisions of this act.

The employees are fully protected under the Clark amendment. Private plans must be available to all employees without regard to age. Employees may elect whether they will come under the Federal or the private plan. Benefits under the private plan must be equal to or better than the benefits under the Federal plan.

Contributions under the private plan must be deposited with life insurance companies, annuity organization, or trustees approved by the Social Security Board. Termination of employment, whether voluntary or involuntary, constitutes withdrawal from the private plan. Upon an employee's withdrawal from the private plan the employer must pay to the Federal plan an amount equal to the taxes otherwise payable by the employer and the employee, plus 3-percent compound interest. Upon death of the employee his estate shall receive not less than the amount it would have received under the Federal plan.

The Social Security Board may at any time withdraw its approval of the private plan if it fails to meet its requirements. No financial advantage will accrue to employers who may be permitted to retain their private pension system, since they are required to contribute to the private plan not less than they would pay under the Government plan. For this reason, the continuation of the private pension plans will not result in the discharge of the older employees, as some contend.

So far as this argument is concerned, I might add that a private pension plan would cost the employer far more than the amount of taxes he would otherwise pay to the Federal Government. His chief interest in having a more liberal plan is to provide for his relatively older employees. If he expected to discharge these older employees he would not be asking to have his private system continued. The sincerity of the private employers is demonstrated by the fact that they are now voluntarily paying pensions to about 150,000 superannuated employees.

The argument that the adoption of the Clark amendment will cause titles II and VIII to be held unconstitutional is based upon the theory that it links the two titles together and discloses their true purpose.

As a matter of fact, it has been recognized all the time that titles II and VIII are tied together, and must be so regarded by any court passing judgment on them.

Other provisions of these two titles link them together, such as the sections setting forth those who are neither subject to the taxes or the benefits. Hence the Clark amendment itself would not make titles II and VIII unconstitutional.

The purpose of this bill is to provide security for the aged, and the Clark amendment permits private employers to make more abundant provision for their employees than the Federal Government proposes to make.

The private company method, as included in the Clark amendment, is better for the employees of those 600 companies than is the Federal Government system proposed to be set up in this bill, as to which you are taking a great chance of a decision that it is entirely unconstitutional. If the private pension plans are broken up by this legislation, and the Federal pension plan is later invalidated, the 3,000,000 employees who are now covered by the private plans will be without any protection. In other words, they have everything to lose and nothing to gain under the Federal plan.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the Clark amendment will be adopted and that the motion I made to recede and concur will be the action of the House when the vote comes upon it. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL].

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I think it would be well to see just what this act, in its original form, provided for unemployment compensation, and then to examine the Clark amendment and see how one fits into the other or whether there is conflict between the two.

The act as passed by the House provided for a Federal plan to be financed by the levying of taxes upon the employer and upon the employee measured by the pay roll. This money was to be put into the Federal Treasury. It was to enable the Federal Treasury to finance these old-age benefits. If the money were not obtained in this way, we would have to levy other taxes to provide revenue out of which to finance the old-age benefits. The act as passed by the House provides that a man reaching the age of 65 years and having been employed for 5 years or more under employment that comes within the provisions of the act may at the age of 65 and thereafter receive a certain monthly payment called a "benefit" or "annuity." It is evident to you that a man in middle life or approaching old age, who works for 5, 10, or 15 years at an average salary, will not have been able to contribute by his own contributions and by the contributions of his employer in his behalf a sufficient sum of money to finance the annuity to such retired worker; but under the provision of the act no retired worker will receive less than $10 a month, regardless of the fact that he may not have earned in the annuity fund more than $1 a month or even less than $1 a month. He will get an annuity of $10 a month if he comes within this provision and has worked 5 or 10 years only.

Under that provision we are paying to that man an unearned benefit. We are going down into the Treasury to get the money that has not been contributed to the Treasury on his behalf, which money must come out of the general fund of the Treasury, paid in there from tax levies. But we have young men and men in middle life in this category of employment. The young men contribute to the fund and their employers contribute to the fund for them, for a period of 20, 25, or 30, and sometimes 40 years. That money goes into the Treasury. Those young men are not drawing money out of the Treasury during those 20 or 30 or 40 years. So we borrow the money from the money that they pay in, in order to pay these benefits to the older men who are retired after a few years' work. Only in that way can we finance the fund. If we do not have that financial support for the fund, then we would have to go out and levy general taxes to put into the Treasury to pay this money. In the course of a few years it will amount to more than a billion dollars a year paid out in benefits. So that the bill, as it left the House financed itself by the young men carrying, for the first few years, the fund out of which the benefits are paid to the older men, thereby saving the Federal Treasury the necessity of going out and levying general taxes to supplement the Treasury funds for the purpose of financing these benefits.

Now, what does the Clark amendment provide? It provides that the employer, whose employees so choose, may set up an independent pension reserve or benefit system, and be relieved from participation in the contribution to the Federal plan. It means that whenever all of the employees of a private industry chose to go under a private plan, they may contribute to a fund set up by the private industry, and no part of that fund shall go into the Federal Treasury. It means, of course, under the provision of the Clark amendment, that the employer and the employee must pay into that private fund an amount equal to that paid into the Federal fund by others who are not under a private plan. It means that when a worker withdraws from a private plan the employer must pay into the Federal Treasury on his behalf the amount of tax previously paid on his account into the private fund, plus 3-percent interest compounded.

It means that in the case of the death of an employee under the private plan his estate will receive the same amount of money from the private pension plan as it would receive from the Federal pension plan, and that is the amount the employee himself has contributed plus 3-percent interest compounded annually. It does not mean that his estate will get what the employee has contributed plus what the employer has contributed, but only the amount the employee has contributed, and that is the same amount the estate would receive under the Federal plan. But here is the difference: Under the private plan the employer keeps whatever the employer himself contributes to the private plan. Under the Federal plan the amount the employer contributes goes into the Federal Treasury to finance the general compensation fund. It means that under the Clark amendment it would be to the financial advantage of the industry maintaining such plan to employ only young men and not to employ old men, to keep in their employment young men, and as men reach middle age to discharge them, because the companies make their money, they earn their benefit fund, from the contributions of the younger men.

Mr. Speaker, my time is exhausted and I shall be unable to discuss further the Clark amendments and the reasons why they should not be adopted. However, under leave to extend my remarks I submit for the RECORD in support of my contention that the so-called "Clark amendments" would totally wreck and destroy the unemployment-compensation provisions of this act, this memoranda prepared for me giving an analysis of the so-called "Clark amendments" and their effects upon this legislation:

HOW THE CLARK AMENDMENT WOULD WORK OUT

1. Under the Clark amendment existing private-pension plans would either have to be abandoned or fundamentally altered.

From the debate it was evident that many Senators voted for the Clark amendment under the impression that its adoption is necessary to save the existing private-annuity plans. It was not appreciated that all private-annuity plans will have to be radically altered even with the Clark amendment in operation. This is true for the following reasons:

(a) None of the existing plans provides for repayment of the entire amount contributed in behalf of an employee upon his withdrawal from employment. The most liberal of these plans provide for the return to the withdrawing employee of the money he has contributed, with interest. Under the Clark amendment the employer will have to pay back taxes with interest, for all withdrawing employees, which, under the assumptions on which this amendment is based will be equivalent, on the average, to repayment of the contributions of both the employer and the employee with interest. The Clark amendment thus places an additional burden on the existing private-annuity plans and this will necessitate recalculation of their actuarial basis, with either increases in contributions or reductions in benefits.

(b) All existing plans allow annuities only after employment for a relatively long period of time—a majority of them for periods of 20 to 25 years. Such plans certainly cannot be regarded as being as liberal as the Federal old-age-benefit plan. They will, consequently, have to be revised in this respect. This will again affect the financial basis of these plans and necessitate changes in contribution rates or benefits.

(c) Many of the existing plans have no reserve or only very inadequate reserves. Many more are not irrevocably funded.

(d) Many plans do not pay as liberal benefits on retirement as does the Federal plan, even to employees who have long been with the company. Few, if any, plans pay as liberal benefits for employees who are with the company only for periods of less than, say, 20 years.

The changes which the Clark amendment will necessitate in private annuity plans are extensive and fundamental. Without the Clark amendment most employers, as a practical matter, will wish to reorganize their annuity plans, although they are not legally compelled to do so. But it will be no more difficult to reorganize existing private plans to give benefits supplemental to the Federal plan than it is to revise these plans to conform with the Clark amendment.

2. Under the Clark amendment it will be of advantage, both to the older employees and to the employers, for present older employees to come under the Federal old-age-benefits plan, while the younger employees will be covered by the private annuity plans.

The annuities payable under title II are a percentage of the earnings of the employees after the taking effect of the Social Security Act. The percentage of the earnings on which the annuities are based is materially greater where the total earnings are small than where they are large.

Present older employees will have small total earnings because they will be under the system but a few years. They will consequently get much larger benefits than their own contributions and those of their employers would buy from insurance companies.

All private annuity plans are constructed on precisely the opposite principle. Most of them give no benefits at all to employees who have not been in the employ of the company for a very long period of years, most commonly 20 to 25 years. None of them favors employees who are under the system but a short time.

Under the Clark amendment the employees may elect whether they wish to come under the private annuity plan or under the plan of Federal benefits. Since the social-security bill gives such a distinct advantage to employees who are in the system only a short time—as will be at present all employees now past middle age—it is very evident that these employees will elect to come under the Federal plan. It is to their own interest, as well as to that of the employer, that they should do so. Under the circumstances it is almost certain that substantially all employees who are past middle age when the Social Security Act takes effect, or when a new private annuity plan is inaugurated in the future, will come under the Federal system while the younger employees will be covered under the private annuity plan.

3. Under the amendment it will be to the advantage of the employer to hire only men in the younger age groups.

It needs little explanation that the contributions can be less to pay the same annuity to a man who remains in an annuity system a long number of years than to one who remains in the system but a few years. The cost of an annuity of $1 per annum, beginning at age 65, purchased at insurance company rates, is approximately $1.8622 at age 22; $2.1827 at age 27; $4.2710 at age 47; $6.4757 at age 57.

With such greater costs for older-age groups, it is very evident that an employer can provide benefits as liberal as those of the Federal plan at a much lower cost, if he pursues the policy of hiring only men in the lower-age groups. Employers do not have to discharge employees when they grow old to get this advantage. All that they have to do is to establish a low hiring age limit. Many employers now have such low hiring age limits. The Clark amendment will very materially increase the tendency toward the adoption of such hiring age limits.

4. Employers with private annuity plans will derive great financial advantage through all deaths of employees before reaching retirement age.

Approximately 75 percent of all persons entering industry die before they reach age 65, which is the retirement age in title II and under most private annuity systems. Whenever an employee dies, his estate is to get, under the Clark amendment, at least as liberal benefits as under title II. Under title II the benefits payable on the death of an employee will on the average equal the contributions made by the employee himself, with 3 percent interest. The estate will not get back the contributions of the employer. In the Federal system the saving which thus results goes to the employees who survive until they reach retirement age. Under the Clark amendment this saving will go to the employer.

5. The Clark amendment will wreck the financial basis of the Federal system.

The taxes collected under title VIII of the Social Security Act will in over a long period of time equal the benefit payments that will have to be made under title II. This actuarial balance, however, will be possible only on the assumption that all industrial workers will be brought within the Federal plan. As has been noted above, the Clark amendment will operate to take out of the Federal plan many of the younger industrial workers, while it will give an excessive percentage of the older workers to the Federal system. Under title II the taxes paid by and for the benefits of the older workers will not equal the benefits paid to them, while the taxes paid on the earnings of the younger workers will exceed these benefits. Consequently, through covering a large percentage of the younger employees in the private annuity plans, the financial basis of the Federal system will be wrecked. The benefits provided for the older workers can in that event be paid only through increases in the taxes upon employers who remain within the system or through large governmental contributions.

The same effect is produced through the fact that under the Clark amendment the Federal plan will not get the advantage of the employers' contributions in the event of the death of employees before reaching age 65. This will affect approximately 75 percent of all employees who will be brought under the private annuity plans, and will cause an immense loss to the Federal system.

6. This amendment will greatly increase the difficulties of administering titles VIII and II.

Under the amendment not all employees and not all employers of plants having approved private annuity plans will be outside of the Federal system. Employers will have to pay taxes on those of their employees who are not under their private annuity plan. Without private annuity plans, the tax collection is quite simple, as the Treasury has to pay attention only to the total of the employer's pay roll. Under the Clark amendment it will have to check the individual employees on the pay rolls, immensely increasing the difficulties of collection.

Other difficulties result when employees leave the employment of an exempted employer or otherwise withdraw from his private plan. In that event back taxes have to be paid, and these may be due for many years. This involves going into all pay rolls during the period while the withdrawing employees were with the plan, assuming that such pay rolls have been preserved. There is nothing in the amendment, however, to require that the pay rolls shall be kept any particular time, and if pay rolls are no longer available it will be still more difficult to ascertain the back taxes that are due. The great majority of all employees who come into the employment of an exempted employer are certain not to remain within the employment until age 65, so that this problem of computing the back taxes will be one which will recur in many thousands (perhaps millions) of cases annually.

7. Only relatively large plants can set up private annuity plans.

Of the employees covered under existing private annuity plans, 30 percent are with companies that have over 100,000 employees; 70 percent with companies having over 25,000 employees; and 98 percent with companies having over 2,000 employees. A small employer cannot take advantage of the Clark amendment. It is one which in practice will be a special privilege to the large employers only.

RESPECTS IN WHICH THE CLARK AMENDMENT IS EXTREMELY VAGUE

1. It is not clear in this amendment whether the private annuity plans must be as liberal as the system of Federal old-age benefits under title II of the Social Security Act for all employees, regardless of age or length of employment, or only whether the plan must on the average give as liberal benefits as those provided under title II.

This is a very important point. A private annuity plan may very well give more liberal benefits than the Federal plan for the great majority of employees and yet give no benefits at all, or very inadequate benefits, to the older employees and those who are with the company only a very short time. Most of the existing plans give benefits only to employees who have been with the company for 20 to 25 years. To such employees more liberal benefits can be given than under the Federal plan, and yet the effect of such a private annuity system would be to dump all of the relatively short-time employees on the Federal system, and it is for these employees that the annuities under the Federal plan are most costly.

2. There is no requirement that the contributions to the private annuity plan must be irrevocably earmarked for the payment of pensions or that pensions once granted must be continued throughout the life of the pensioner.

The amendment provides that the contributions must be deposited with a life-insurance company, an annuity organization, or a trustee approved by the Board. There is nothing to prevent the employer from terminating his plan at any time; in fact, it is provided that the board shall withdraw its approval of a plan whenever the employer so requests. When this occurs, there is nothing to guarantee that employees already retired will continue to receive their pensions. The employer must pay back taxes for the employees then in his employ, but any balance remaining in his fund belongs to him.

3. No control is vested in the social security board over contracts which the life-insurance companies, annuity organizations, and trustees make with employers maintaining private annuity plans.

The provisions of these contracts are very material for the adequate protection of the rights of the beneficiaries, but it is at least doubtful under the amendment whether the board can refuse to approve a life-insurance company, an annuity organization, or a trustee because it does not believe that the contract made with the employer adequately protects the employees.

4. No safeguards are included which will make it certain that the Government will be able to collect the back taxes which become payable upon withdrawals from the plan or its complete termination.

Withdrawals will occur in a majority of all cases, since most employees do not remain with one employer throughout their entire industrial life. Likewise, there will be numerous instances in which employers who have established private annuity plans will go out of business or for other reasons discontinue their plans.

For these reasons, it is certain that employers will have to pay large amounts in back taxes. There is no provision in the amendment under which employers are required to set up reserves for the payment of back taxes. The annuity fund must be deposited with a life-insurance company, an annuity organization, or a trustee, but there is nothing in the amendment which provides that the annuity fund shall be available for the payment of back taxes. Further, an annuity fund may be exhausted and no money may be available for the payment of back taxes.

I. FURTHER COMMENTS ON THE CLARK AMENDMENT

1. The Clark amendment provides adverse selection against the Federal system. While the requirement that the employer and employee pay an equal amount of taxes into the private fund prevents the employer from reducing his payments below the level of the taxes, nevertheless, it is almost certain that the Government fund will be loaded with all the older employees and find it impossible to pay the scale of benefits specified out of the taxes provided in title VIII. When a deficit occurs in the future, the rates in title VIII will have to be adjusted upward or the Government will have to subsidize the system out of general-tax revenues.

2. As was pointed out in the debate on the floor of the Senate, this amendment seriously threatens the constitutionality of title VIII. This exemption is wholly different from the other exemptions in the title. It taxes employers who fail to set up an approved annuity system and falls squarely under the language of the Supreme Court in the Child Labor Tax case holding the so-called "tax" in that law a penalty because "it provides a heavy exaction for a departure from a detailed and specified course of conduct of business."

In order to save title VIII from being held unconstitutional, it would appear imperative either to throw out this amendment altogether or to change it from an exemption of the tax to a payment in title II to such employers.

3. There is nothing in the Clark amendment which will effectively prevent employers from placing all their older employees on the Government fund and retaining in their own fund the younger employees. They could even cause employees to change from one fund to another at any future time, if such change became advantageous to their own fund. For example, if one of their employees were due to retire within a short time, and the contributions paid in on his behalf were less than the actuarial equivalent of his annuity rights, he could be induced to elect the Government system. It is almost a certainty that private employers in the future would keep in their own fund only those employees who would be profitable to the fund. In this way these employers and their younger employees would shirk all responsibility for the older employees—even those within the employment of the particular fund. Obviously this will have to be corrected.

4. Under the Clark amendment, practically every employee of a private employer having an approved retirement plan would be entitled, when he retired, to draw two benefits—one from the private plan, one from the Government for employment other than under such employer. Practically no employees would have worked for a single employer for a lifetime. This would result in these employees drawing larger benefits than they would be entitled to if they were under only one system. For example, suppose an employee with an average salary of $1,000 annually were employed for 10 years in employment under the Government fund and 10 years under a private plan just before retirement. He would be entitled to receive a monthly benefit of $20.83 from the Government and an equal amount from the private plan, making a total of $41.66 a month. But if he had remained continuously under either the Government or the private plan, he would be entitled to draw a monthly annuity of only $29.17. In other words, this employee would receive a pension of $12.49 per month greater than he would otherwise be entitled to. This would constitute a heavy drain upon both funds. The private employer may escape such extra cost by refusing to employ older persons, who have been previously employed with other employers, but the Government cannot so protect itself.

The results which will inevitably flow from this defect will be the absolute refusal of companies with private plans to employ older or even middle-aged workers, except under the condition that they elect the Government plan. This will be difficult to do. It is prohibited in the law, and the employee will recognize that it is to his advantage under the circumstances to elect the private plan. The result will be a refusal by the employer to take on any but very young employees.

5. The Clark amendment provides a very great incentive for employers with private plans to employ only younger persons and to discharge their older employees. By escaping their just share of the cost of annuities for the older persons, such employers in the future will be able to pay much larger annuities than provided in the Government plan. It is well known that in the long run retirement allowances become a component part of salary. The larger the retirement allowance, the lower the salary which is necessary to pay to retain employees. This is well known. Many illustrations could be cited. Employers with private plans will profit almost as much by being able to pay larger benefits as if they were permitted to reduce their contributions.

Under further leave to extend I here submit, as part of my remarks, the following statement by J. B. Glenn:

ALLOWING THE ADOPTION OF THE CLARK AMENDMENT WOULD RESULT IN AN ULTIMATE COST OF BILLIONS OF DOLLARS TO THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

To pay benefits scheduled under title II to those who will be entitled to benefits during the earlier years of the Federal annuity system, the Federal Government will deliberately incur a huge deficit of many billions of dollars. This is chiefly because the older workers will receive in annuities much more than the total taxes paid by them and by their employers on their behalf.

The plan is so designed, however, that this huge deficit is gradually wiped out by the profits the Government will make on the annuities of younger workers. The deficit will be eliminated because the tax paid by the employers of younger workers and by the younger workers themselves will more than suffice to pay the benefits to these young workers.

For example, take the case of a young worker, earning $100 per month and entering the system in 1949, at 24 years of age. The profit to the Government from his contribution of $36 per year and his employer's contribution of $36 per year, will be $24 per year, because the sum of $48 per year would be enough to purchase the benefits which he will receive under the bill.

Suppose there are 5,000,000 of these young workers ultimately absorbed in private pension plans. The Federal Government will annually lose $24 for each such worker in these private plans, or $120,000,000 per year. This is part of the profit which was calculated to offset the deficit incurred in the earlier years of the plan and to make the plan actuarially sound. The loss of this profit would make it necessary for the Federal Government to make up this sum from other sources in order to meet its obligations under title II.

J. B. GLENN,
Fellow of the Actuarial Society of America, Fellow of the American Institute of Actuaries, Fellow of the Casualty Actuarial Society.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS].

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I must begin by confessing that I have little to contribute after the discussion we have had by Congressman HILL except my deep conviction of the ill wisdom, indeed of the very destructiveness of the Clark amendment. I am not alone in this opinion. May I give you the advantage for a minute of the result of a comprehensive and responsible study of the whole subject of private industrial pension systems? Observe these two large volumes entitled "Industrial Pension Systems." These books represent the investigation of an economist and statistician, Dr. Latimer, who undertook this work, just published in 1933, at the instance of the Industrial Relations Counselors, Inc. This board's purpose, so far as I can gather, would resemble in a general way the Brookings Institution, with whose contributions you are doubtless familiar. Its membership consisted of Raymond B. Fosdick, chairman; William B. Dixon; Ernest M. Hopkins; Cyrus McCormick, Jr.; John D. Rockefeller, 3d; Arthur Woods; and Owen D. Young.

Now, let me read the conclusions of this very eleborate and responsible study:

By and large the bulk of industrial pension plans in the United States and Canada are insecure; first, because of inadequate financing; second, because of lack of actuarial soundness, even in those cases where some funds have been provided; third, because of failure to provide proper legal safeguards both in connection with funds and with the preservation of rights for employees; and, fourth, because of the absence of definite administrative procedure for carrying out the terms of the plans. Unless the policies pursued by most companies at the present time are changed, there is not much hope for improvement (p. 902).

And then a sentence which appears a little farther on in the book:

The voluntary provision of complete old-age security by industry under a business economy in which the criterion of success and the condition of continuous existence is profits, inevitably involves inescapable contradictions (p. 945).

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. I yield for a very brief question.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. As I understand the Clark amendment, it subjects all private retirement systems, both as to conditions of retirement supervision and the investment of the funds to the board created under this act.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. That is true, but the fact lacks significance. Such control is of nominal value only after these interests have been allowed to chisel in and appropriate the low-cost employees, leaving the high-cost employees on the Government fund.

If anybody in the United States can speak on this subject with an assurance of sincerity and, indeed, with a high degree of guaranteed knowledge, it is the president of the American Federation of Labor. In a circular letter received this morning, I find him stating:

Labor is very much exercised over this amendment, as it exempts private annuity plans conducted by employers. Anyone who is well acquainted with the reasons for creating these private annuity plans and the suffering that follows could not for a moment approve that amendment.

I jump several paragraphs of his letter:

Now, therefore, in the name of the organized wageworkers of the United States, as well as those unorganized, I wish to appeal to you to vote against incorporating in the social-security bill the Clark amendment.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman has given much thought to this subject. I wish he would discuss, if he will, the effect of the Clark amendment on persons 45 years of age and over.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. It is perfectly apparent in entering into any annuity system like this, Mr. Speaker, that those who enter early would need to pay but a very, very small annual subscription to build their annuities payable to them 30 or 40 years later. In the complete wage-annuity system provided by this bill it is also perfectly apparent that those who enter it older would have to pay much larger subscriptions. The bill provides a flat rate of subscription on all to build a fund adequate to take care of young and old.

Under the Senate amendment the employer by "contracting out" with insurance companies could get much lower rates for young employees, with the result that young persons would be preferred for employment. They attempt to meet this self-evident objection by referring to the following proviso in the amendment:

Provided, That no employer shall make election to come or remain under the plan a condition precedent to the securing or retention of employment.

I pronounce this the grand mockery of our age, that the employees are to have the right to elect, forsooth, under the amendment.

Does anybody believe for a moment that it would confer a real power of election upon the laborers of the United States? I have labored myself for many years. There never was a moment in all of my experience when I had the election as to any condition of my employment; and none will be effectually carried here. I do not complain. Doubtless my employers felt they had to have uniform rules, but they made them, and they left me no election. The youngsters now are already under a high preference. You know about the age limit of employability at 45. The youngsters already under preference are going to have their preference magnified. Because as they may cost the employer but 1 percent on wages while the older case 3 percent the older ones are going to be dismissed at the gate.

Mr. Speaker, the working men and women over 45 years of age are already under a deathlike discrimination in the United States today. I had occasion to state the other day that we had started a new class in America, which I christen "America's untouchables."

They are the men, and who without a day in court are rejected and dismissed at the gate because they are 45 years of age. Would you add by this amendment an additional inducement to competing employers to accentuate this monstrous evil even as against those who are now employed? If we cannot do justice to them, let us pity, at least, these old men and women who are thrown on the scrap heap by industry because their arms are no longer strong enough or swift enough to turn its great wheels in the competitive struggle. This is not an amendment intended to reward pioneer employers who, on their motives of humanity, had organized their systems. If that were the motive of the amendment, it would apply only to a company found conducting such a system on the 1st day of January 1935 and in successful operation for a number of years, which, on qualifying with the Board, might be treated as an exemption. [Applause.]

EQUITY AND JUSTICE IN THE PAYMENT TO THE PHILIPPINE GOVERNMENT FOR LOSSES IN ITS CURRENCY RESERVES

Mr. DELGADO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a joint statement to the Senate Committee on Appropriations made by the Philippine Resident Commissioners in the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the Resident Commissioner of the Philippine Islands?

There was no objection.

Mr. DELGADO. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the second deficiency bill for the fiscal year 1935, I think all Members of Congress are entitled to know the Philippine government's side with reference to the item of $23,862,750.78 due said government as part of its currency reserves. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following joint statement of the Philippine Resident Commissioners to the Senate Committee on Appropriations:

To the Chairman and Members of the Senate Committee on Appropriations:

On behalf of the government of the Philippine Islands and the Philippine people whom we have the honor of representing, and agreeable to your suggestion made to us yesterday during our personal appearance before your subcommittee, we respectfully petition your committee to insert in the second deficiency appropriation bill now before you an item of $23,862,750.78 as payment to the government of the Philippine Islands as part of its currency reserves. This item has been recommended in the Budget submitted by the Treasury and War Departments.

In support of this petition we respectfully urge upon you the equity and justice of this payment, as will be gathered by the following:

PAYMENT PROMISED BY CONGRESS

On June 19, 1934, the President of the United States approved an act known as "Public, No. 419", of the Seventy-third Congress, the pertinent provisions of which follow:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed, when the funds therefor are made available, to establish on the books of the Treasury a credit in favor of the treasury of the Philippine Islands for $23,862,750.78, being an amount equal to the increase in value (resulting from the reduction of the weight of the gold dollar) of the gold equivalent at the opening of business on January 31, 1934, of the balances maintained at that time in banks in the continental United States by the government of the Philippine Islands for its gold-standard fund and its treasury-certificate fund, less the interest received by it on such balances.

"SEC. 2. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of the receipts covered into the Treasury under section 7 of the Gold Reserve Act of 1934, by virtue of the reduction of the weight of the gold dollar by the proclamation of the President on January 31, 1934, the amount necessary to establish the credit provided for in section 1 of this act.

The above act was passed as an expression of the American Congress following a complete and exhaustive investigation into the merits of the proposal. We respectfully submit for your consideration a review of the record of the hearing on H. R. 9459 which preceded the enactment of Public, No. 419, Seventy-third Congress, and which hearing was conducted by the House Committee on Insular Affairs.

The bill was reported by the committee of the House and later by the committee of the Senate without a single dissenting vote and was passed by Congress with overwhelming support. No phase of the question was left unexplored by the committees of the House and Senate prior to the passage of that act, and it is noteworthy that not a single witness appeared in opposition to the justice or equity of that proposal. A substantial majority of the Members of the Congress which enacted that measure are Members of the present Congress.

Your petitioners, therefore, feel that unless there are circumstances and conditions to which our attention has not been called which militate against the immediate appropriation of the funds proposed in this congressional act, we are in this petition only asking that the American Congress make the appropriation which it has already authorized in the language of Public, No. 419 "when the funds therefor are made available."

CONDITIONS NOT CHANGED SINCE PASSAGE OF ACT

Since President Roosevelt under date of May 7, 1934, recommended to Congress the authorization of the payment to the Philippine Government no circumstance or condition has changed the basis upon which the President's recommendation was made or the principle underlying the action of Congress in respect thereto.

President Roosevelt's letter addressed to the Chairman of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, May 7, 1934.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Chairman Committee on Banking and Currency,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR FLETCHER: With the approval of the United States, the government of the Philippine Islands has for many years maintained in banks in this country the major portion of the currency reserves of its monetary system, and has always considered these deposits the equivalent of a gold reserve.

The effect of my proclamation of January 31, 1934, was not only to reduce, in terms of gold, the value of these currency reserves, but indirectly to devalue, in terms of gold, the entire currency circulation of the Philippine Islands. The United States enjoyed an increase in the value of its currency reserves corresponding to the decrease in the value of the dollar.

As the Philippine currency is interlocked with the United States gold dollar under laws enacted by the United States Congress, it would be equitable to reestablish the Philippine currency reserves on deposit in the United States at their former gold value as of January 31, 1934.

I am advised that S. 3530, now under consideration before your committee, is designed to accomplish this purpose.

I recommend its enactment.

Very sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

Everything stated in the letter of the President is just as true today as it was in May 1934. The proclamation of January 31, 1934, did in fact reduce, in terms of gold, the value "of these currency reserves" and did devalue, in terms of gold, the currency circulation of the Philippine Islands. That condition maintains. Nothing has corrected it.

Philippine currency is interlocked with the United States gold dollar, as the President so clearly stated, under laws enacted by the United States Congress, which laws are still in full force and effect.

Nothing has removed any of these conditions upon which the President declared "it would be equitable to reestablish the Philippine currency reserves on deposit in the United States at their former gold value as of January 31, 1934."

SENATE COMMITTEE HAS ACTED

Your attention is respectfully invited to the following portion of the report of the Senate Committee on Insular Affairs in connection with S. 3530, the Senate bill which ultimately became Public, No. 419:

"The experts of our Government have decided that the credit of $23,868,750.78 is just, equitable, and fair, and the committee feels that no great government can do less than what is proposed in this bill for its dependent people. It is in no wise suggested that any and all funds on deposit in this country to the credit of individuals and the insular government, over and above the funds actually held as currency reserve funds, should be enhanced in value by an act of Congress.

"Coincident with the Independence Act, a refusal on the part of the American Government to meet its moral obligation in readjusting the currency reserves of the insular government, the value of which is interlocked with our own monetary system, is inconceivable. Such refusal would be an omission unworthy of a great Government and of the Congress, on whom this responsibility now rests."

The "moral obligation in readjusting the currency reserves of the insular government" to which the Senate Committee referred, is, in the absence of any changed conditions or circumstances, as compelling today as it was at the time the Senate Committee so conclusively declared its position. There remains only the moral obligation to carry out the moral obligation agreed to.

LOSSES INCURRED BY PHILIPPINE GOVERNMENT

Nothing could be more conclusive as to the factual circumstances surrounding losses to the Philippine government as a result of the President's proclamation than the following comprehensive statement contained in the report of the Senate Committee on Insular Affairs (Rept. No. 1209, 73d Cong.):

"On January 31, 1934, the insular government had on deposit in American banks $56,276,056.92, a fund constituting the major portion of the currency reserves of the Philippine government, on which the circulation of the insular government is based. This fund, deposited in dollars, has always been considered as the equivalent of gold. Applying the same revaluation as given the United States gold dollar by the proclamation of the President, this fund now amounts to $95,282,398.87, or an increase, had the fund been in actual gold, of $39,006,341.95.

"It is obvious that any change in the value of our dollar automatically changes in the same proportion the value of the peso, the standard unit of value in the Philippine Islands. It is also obvious that the Presidential proclamation of January 31, 1934, in effect, expanded the currency reserves of the United States, but contracted the reserves of the Philippine government, since the Philippine reserves are in dollars.

"In a conference between officials of the Treasury Department, the Bureau of Insular Affairs, acting for the Secretary of War, and the Budget officer, it was decided that the full amount of this credit should not be given to the reserve fund of the insular government, but from this $39,006,341.95 should be deducted $15,143,591.17, the interest which has accrued to the insular government since January 1923. This leaves a balance of $23,862,750.78, which, it is thought by the President and the above-named officials, represents the sum which should be credited to the Philippine government on the books of the Treasury in order to restore the gold value of the Philippine currency reserves as of January 31, 1934.

"When the gold content of the United States dollar was diminished we took credit on our books for approximately $2,811,013,126. Had the insular government had on deposit on the date of the above-mentioned proclamation gold bullion or actual coins as their currency reserve, there would have been no need for this legislation or any adjustment, for the reason that their gold would have increased in value, as did the United States gold.

"During the fall of 1932 the government of the Philippine Islands made representations to this Government with a view of including specific stipulation in the depository agreements that withdrawal of its currency reserve funds should be in gold coin of the United States at the election of the Philippine government. The Secretary of War through the Bureau of Insular Affairs, acting for this Government, stated that he did not 'deem as expedient the amendment of the depository agreement as suggested by the Philippine government.'

"In March 1933, 10 months prior to the President's proclamation, other representations were made on the part of the Philippine government seeking the assurance that deposits of the Philippine government in the United States stand on an equal basis with the deposits of the United States Government and recommended that all deposits of the insular government, except $10,000,000 required for ordinary expenses, be deposited in the Treasury of the United States. Under conditions obtaining in this country in 1932 and 1933, the officials of our Government deemed it inadvisable to accede to any of these requests, although the Philippine government had every right to make these requests and to expect them to be granted."

Not only does the above statement of the Senate committee establish the loss to the Philippine government resulting from devaluation, but it clearly establishes the equities involved in the claim of the Philippine government which Congress promptly recognized by the passage of the act of June 19, 1934.

COOPERATION OF PHILIPPINE GOVERNMENT

The Governor General of the Philippine Islands on June 29, 1933, after reviewing the financial and monetary affairs of the Philippine Islands and with a view to future developments in respect thereto, officially requested:

"That our gold standard and Treasury-certificate funds be converted into gold coin of the standard existing at the time these deposits were made with the depository banks; this coin to be deposited in the United States Treasury or Federal Reserve banks and authority of the President secured to earmark it for their account, by amending the Executive order of April 5, 1933 (which was the first order of the President restricting the circulation of gold). There will be, however, no necessity for withdrawing the above-mentioned deposits from the present depository banks at this time if it is possible to obtain Government assurance that conversion into gold of the standard existing as above outlined, may be at a later date."

Here was an expression of the Governor General anticipating those necessary changes which would place the Philippine reserves in a position of security in the face of any subsequent order or proclamation.

Between June 29, 1933, and January 17, 1934, as pointed out in the Senate report, numerous cables were forwarded by the Governor General of the islands expressing the concern of the islands and stressing the necessity for assuring the gold content of the Philippine reserves on deposit in the United States.

These were supplemented on January 15, 1934, by a letter from the acting secretary of finance of the Philippine Islands addressed to the Secretary of War, in which was reiterated the desire of the Philippine Government that its deposits be treated by the United States Treasury as deposits of coined gold.

The request was sent to the Secretary of the Treasury by the Secretary of War on January 17, 1934.

Finally on January 17, 1934, 2 weeks prior to the President's proclamation, the following cable was sent by the Governor General to the Secretary of War:

"Referring to telegram from this office June 29, no. 212, in particular, as well as other previous cables pertaining to Philippine currency. Have you further information relative to earmarking in gold Treasury certificates funds and the gold-standard fund? Believe allotment of gold to these funds on the basis of present gold content is but fair to Philippines, thus granting Philippine government same advantage as United States in reduction of content of gold dollars backing gold-standard fund and Treasury-certificate fund. Am exceedingly anxious to receive definite decision."

All of the above was reviewed in the report of the Senate committee before enactment of the act of June 19, 1934, recognizing the justice and equity of the payment to the Philippine government.

The Senate committee on the basis of circumstances, conditions, and acts as above referred to, concluded its report as follows:

"At any time, following these representations, prior to January 31, 1934, the Treasury Department could have lawfully sold to the Philippine government gold in the amount of their currency reserves on deposit in the United States at the old value of $20.67 an ounce, or could have authorized the earmarking of gold to be paid for by the Philippine government with the funds on deposit in the United States. This, however, was not done, although the insular government from time to time has been given assurance by our officials that their interests would be equitably adjusted."

"Our Government, not having acceded to these suggestions and requests, is certainly morally obligated to expand the base of the currency reserves of the dependent government, and to do so without further delay in order to avoid further possible domestic and international financial complications.

"It should be borne in mind that we are dealing in this bill exclusively with the currency reserve funds of the Philippine Islands, and that question should not be confused with the question of individual transactions between the people of the two governments.

"In the case of the Filipino people, they have been forced to take the personal loss—their gold has been turned in, just as was the gold of our own citizens—but no benefits will accrue to them or their government until the value of their gold reserve is reestablished by the Government of the United States. In the case of our own citizens, while the individual may not have been credited, nevertheless, the credit goes to the Federal Government or the whole of the American people, each State, of course, having the same currency system as the Federal Government. It is quite certain that if any State had a separate monetary system tied in with the national money by an act of the Federal Government, the government of such a State would undoubtedly have the same rights and equities as are sought to be established by this bill.

"The Philippine National Bank now owns Liberty bonds and other obligations of our Government amounting to approximately $17,000,000. Likewise, many American securities are held by individual Filipinos. Those obligations will be paid, not in gold, but in legal currency, which means that they will be paid with a devaluated dollar. It should also be stated that the insular government has outstanding bonds of the Manila Railroad payable in pounds, guilders, and Swiss francs. In amortizing these bonds in foreign currencies, due to the difference in exchange as a result of the action of the American Government in revaluing its money, a loss of approximately $10,000,000 will be sustained by the insular government. Surely no one can fail to see the inequity in a failure of our Government to make the insular government whole in a loss occasioned by our own action."

Your attention is directed to supplemental statements of General Cox, Chief of the Bureau of Insular Affairs, on pages 15 to 23 of the hearings of the House Committee on Insular Affairs on H. R. 9459, and to the statement of Lt. Col. Edward A. Stockton, Jr., of the Bureau of Insular Affairs, as contained in the hearings of the House Committee on Appropriations on the second deficiency appropriation bill (pp. 426–427), and to the statement of Mr. Laylin (ibid.) in support of the equities involved in the claim of the Philippine government, all of which stand undisputed in the record.

CONCLUSION

The loss sustained by the Philippine government is definitely established in the depreciation of its currency reserves level due the devaluation of the dollar as a result of the President's proclamation in the amount of $23,862,750.78 after deducting the interest received by it on its deposits prior to January 30, 1934. The loss so incurred would have been avoided had the recommendations of the Philippine government through its designated officials been accepted by the American Government, but which recommendations were not put into effect. When the American Congress was presented with the facts in relation to these matters it solemnly expressed its moral obligation in an act of Congress approved by the President of the United States on June 19, 1934.

Every official of the American Government conversant with or a party to the financial relations of the American Government and the government of the Philippine Islands has recommended the payment of the obligation represented in the claim of the Philippine government.

Your petitioners respectfully submit that in the face of the uncontroverted record, the recommendations of the President of the United States, the recommendations of all public officials conversant with the subject matter, and the solemn act of Congress admitting the moral obligation involved, there is nothing left for the consideration of your committee than the actual appropriation of the item requested.

Conditions and circumstances have not changed. The injury to the Philippine government resulting from the order of the President of January 31, 1934, revaluating the dollar and the equity of the Philippine government to a portion of the "profit" gained by the United States Government as result of the Presidential order, have been clearly established. Your petitioners urgently request your serious consideration of the matters herein related and your favorable action thereon.

Very respectfully submitted.

PEDRO CUEVARA,
F. A. DELGADO,
Philippine Resident Commissioners in the United States.

SOCIAL-SECURITY BILL, 1935

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD].

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I am very much concerned with this amendment, and, as one who has been closely identified with industrial pension plans, I trust that this House will instruct the conferees to reject the so-called "Clark amendment."

The particular reason for my objection to the amendment is that it initiates the Federal system with the worst possible obstacle that we can put in its path. Ever since the creation of the State and private systems there has been a necessary tightening up on the part of industrialists in regard to the appointment of men over 40 years of age. It is a pathetic state to have a constituent of the age of 40, 45, or 50 call on you and tell you his tale of woe as to how he tramped from one industrial plant to another pleading for work, only to be denied the opportunity because his employment would put an increased load on their retirement system. Therefore, for the sake of the aged who are the primary objects of this bill, we ought to eliminate the Clark amendment, and give the Federal system a most appropriate opportunity to display its relative merit.

May I say one other thing from the record? Only 4 percent of the men who are covered by private systems are eventually retired by such systems. Recurring seasonal and cyclical depressions find the aged laid off first. The youthful employees are returned to work first, and in many instances the aged are permanently separated from their jobs and their pensions. Under the Federal system it makes no difference whether you are 20, 40, or 60 years of age, the cost is uniform and does not vary. It would be just as advantageous for an employer in a private plant to employ a man 40 as it would to employ a man 20; but under the system permitted by the Clark amendment it would be to his distinct advantage to employ younger men and to discharge older men. That would be the result of a dual system of pensions.

Private pension plans will have the youth of the country enrolled in their systems, and as men become aged they will have to find a haven of refuge in the Federal plan, and therefore we will be spending more money; we will have the most difficult class to protect, and the private pension plans in protection of their own systems will constantly load the Federal system with the aged workers of the country.

I plead not so much for the pension plan as I plead with you this afternoon for the aged workers of our country; and I say to you, no matter what promises may be made by the proponents of this amendment, the history of our experience with the industrial pension plans during the last quarter of a century indicates that the aged have been penalized and have been taken out of permanent employment and cast upon the scrap heap of life there to depend upon the charity of the Government. Therefore, in justice to the aged and in justice to this plan that we are initiating, let us vote down the Clark amendment and give some hope to the aged, the tragic victims of this machine age. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SAUTHOFF].

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the Clark amendment and I trust that the motion now before the House will be voted down.

The main factor for any concern or any employer in considering what particular annuity system he is going to adopt is the cost of the system. The two prime factors in creating cost are, first, the age of the employee, and, second, the wages of the employee. If it is to be within the control of the private employer what system he is to adopt, naturally he is going to try to reduce these two factors so as to make his cost less by, first, cheaper labor, and, second, younger employees. In this way he can shut out the higher paid labor and he can shut out the older men in the industry. This is exactly the same thing that has been worked, and is being worked today, by department stores and chain stores in the hiring of girls. They hire them on a graduated-scale system. If you work 5 years, you get a raise in pay; if you work 10 years, you get another raise in pay; if you work 15 years, you get a third raise in pay; but before they get to the 10-year period they are let out, and a new crop is constantly coming in. Automatically they are debarred from higher increases in pay. Fire them and you are rid of them. This is the answer, and when these girls go out to seek other jobs in other places they cannot find them. As they grow older it becomes increasingly more difficult to secure work, and thereby increases unemployment.

Besides these two main factors, age and wages, there are some other factors which appeal to me and which I hope you will consider. One of these is when an employee quits and gets a better job, or when he is let out and finds other employment, he starts paying in on his new job, but what happens to what he has already paid in on the old job? In many instances, in fact in most instances, these private systems are under trusteeships, and they are not even protected from claims in case of bankruptcy. In one instance in which I was the attorney I attempted to protect such fund as a preferred fund. The court held there was nothing in the contractual relation that made it a preferred fund, and held that it was commingled with the general assets of the bankrupt concern, and was therefore liable to the debts of the bankrupt concern and that this was not a preferred claim.

It has been mentioned here that many of these firms will take up insurance. Of course they will. They will take up insurance for those over 40 and have a private system for those under 40, because there is nothing in the Clark amendment that provides they cannot set up two systems in one plant. They will take the insurance where it does not cost them as much, because all the overhead of the expense of insurance rates will come out of the fund and not out of the employer. Naturally, he is going to take advantage of this fact.

I now want to point out one more thing which appeals to me as being very serious, and this is the powerful weapon in the hands of the employer over the employee. He can coerce and take away from him all the benefits of the Wagner Labor Disputes Act. The emancipation of the laborer, his deliverance from coercion, his right to act as a free agent, as set forth in this Magna Carta of labor—all its benefits would be seriously endangered if we adopt the Clark amendment.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Speaker, in connection with my request to extend my remarks I should like to supplement the request by asking that I be permitted to include memoranda analyzing the Clark amendment and illustrating how it would work and also a one-page letter from J. B. Glenn, Fellow of the Actuarial Society of America, on the same subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BOLAND). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE ON RULES

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Rules may have until midnight to file reports from that committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

In accordance with the permission granted by the House Mr. O'CONNOR submitted the following privileged resolution:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. J. Res. 348, a joint resolution "Authorizing exchange of coins and currencies and immediate payment of gold-clause securities by the United States; withdrawing the right to sue the United States on its bonds and other similar obligations; limiting the use of certain appropriations; and for other purposes." That after general debate, which shall be confined to the joint resolution and continue not to exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the Chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the joint resolution shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the joint resolution for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the joint resolution and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit with or without instructions.

THE SECURITY BILL

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WITHROW].

Mr. WITHROW. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I am opposed to the Clark amendment for two reasons. First, because I am of the opinion that it is actuarially unsound, and second, because I am convinced that it will encourage discrimination against the older employee when he seeks either employment or reemployment.

No plan can be actuarially sound unless all the employees in that industry, both young and old, come under one plan, and unless all of those employees contribute to one fund.

Under the Clark amendment it would be permissible to have not only a private annuity fund, but likewise a portion of the employees of that factory could come under the Federal plan. It naturally follows, owing to the fact that it would be to the advantage of employers, that the older employees would have to come under the Federal plan and to younger employees would choose the private annuity plan. That would result in the younger employees not contributing to the governmental fund, and over a period of years one of two things would happen—either that fund would be depleted or the premiums to be paid would become prohibitive.

We have a number of examples.

I am a member of the railroad brotherhood. I was an officer prior to my election to Congress. We organized an annuity plan that was voluntary. The result was that the only men who chose to come under the plan were the old employees.

The plan had not been working very long before we found that it was a mistake. The result was that the brotherhood lost a number of million dollars, and I sincerely hope that this body will profit by the sad mistakes that we made during those years.

In cases where railroads now have company pension plans to which both employer and employee contribute, it has been our experience that the managements have found reason to lay off employees on one pretext or another, prior to the time they reached a pensionable age. This is not a matter of theory or conjecture. I can cite numerous examples.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WITHROW. I yield.

Mr. HOUSTON. What effect would this have on the railroad pension plan?

Mr. WITHROW. It would have no effect at all—none whatever.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand that, but in the event that we defeat the Clark amendment, as I hope we will, what effect will it have on the present retirement pension plan?

Mr. WITHROW. None at all. Under the Clark amendment it would be to the advantage of the employer to have hired only men in the younger age groups. The cost of an annuity of $1 per annum, beginning at the age of 65, purchased at insurance company rates, is approximately $1.86 at age of 22; $2.18 at age of 27; $4.27 at age of 47; $8.47 at age of 57.

With such greater costs for older age groups, it is very evident that an employer can provide benefits as liberal as those of the Federal plan at a much lower cost if he pursues the policy of hiring only men in the lower age groups. Employers do not have to discharge employees when they grow old to get this advantage. All that they have to do is to establish a low hiring age limit. Many employers now have such low hiring age limits. The Clark amendment would very materially increase the tendency toward the adoption of such hiring age limits and preclude older men from securing employment.

I cannot go further with this subject in the limited time allotted to me. However, it is certain that in order for the Government plan to be successful it must include all age groups, and especially the younger age groups, in order to maintain adequate reserves without resorting to prohibitive contributions by employees or huge subsidies from the Government.

The Clark amendment is unsound in every respect.

I urge that it be defeated. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I trust the House will insist on disagreeing to and vote down what is known as the "Clark amendment." I do not pretend to pass on the motives of those who favor this amendment. For aught I know they are sincere, but I am sure that the effect of the Clark amendment will be to cripple or destroy this legislation so that its purposes and its objectives will not be accomplished. This debate has demonstrated clearly that there are many who give but lukewarm or half-hearted support to this legislation, who at heart are opposed to it and would be delighted, in fact, overjoyed, if it could be weakened by the adoption of some amendment whereby it would not accomplish the purpose and objectives for which it is designed. If the Clark amendment should be adopted, that means it would throw the burden on the weak, or almost entirely upon the Government, and that of itself, in my judgment, would tend to so weaken the whole plan that it will be of little or no benefit. Under the Clark amendment the employer with a private plan is exempt only when he is administering his plan properly. Otherwise he is not exempt. If the Clark amendment should be adopted, then you will by necessity have to set up a bureaucracy with a large number of employees because the employee under the Clark plan who is not satisfied with the treatment he receives will be coming post haste to Washington to have an investigation of the employer as to whether or not he is carrying out the purposes and requirements of the act. In that way it will require a large number of Government employees and it will build up a bureaucracy in Washington, the number of whose employees it is not possible at this time to forecast. Moreover, if this law is to succeed, it must have two purposes. It must accomplish the purpose for which it is designed, and it must also stand the test of the courts, and everyone who is familiar with this bill, who is qualified to pass a legal opinion, is convinced that if the Clark amendment is adopted, it seriously endangers the constitutionality of the bill.

They say, on the other hand, and my good friend from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] contended, that in case the bill should be declared null and void, then the private plan would be destroyed and there would be no protection whatever; but I call his attention to the fact that it is not until 1937 that title VIII is effective, and there will be ample time to have the validity of this act tested in the courts, and if it should fail, then the private plans would still be in existence. So there is no force or potency to that argument.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. As I understand it, under the Clark amendment there is no provision whereby a corporation which wants to have its private pension plan may protect its employees against its own bankruptcy and the fund being dissipated, so that the employees would not get anything.

Mr. DOUGHTON. In many cases that is true. Under the Clark amendment it would not be profitable for older employees to come under private plans. They get favored treatment under the Government plan, and so they would want to stay under the Government plan. The only people who would be covered by private plans would be the younger workers. Thus the Government plan would be left with all the "bad risks", while all the strong contributors would be exempt. Very soon the Government fund would be insolvent, and the entire insurance principle would be destroyed.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am confident the membership of the House will vote down the motion to concur, and further insist on disagreeing to the Clark amendment. [Applause.]

NOTE.—Attention should perhaps be directed to the act of April 19, 1930 (46 Stat. 224, ch. 194) by which Congress authorized the State Highway Board of Georgia to cooperate with the State Highway Department of South Carolina in construction and operation of a bridge across the Savannah River at Augusta, Ga. Such cooperation might very well involve some written agreement as to terms and conditions; so that in substance the situation might not be very different from the act, e. g., of June 9, 1932, noted above, where the words "cooperative agreements" were used. The question might then be raised whether the congressional sanction in such cases is not simply on the ground that an interstate stream is involved; it might be argued that such a working agreement, not affecting the territorial sovereignty of the States, is not within the scope of compacts requiring ratification by Congress.

Notice may also be taken of the half-way cases, where the United States has negotiated with individual States, e. g.:

Act of March 21, 1934 (48 Stat. 453, c. 72), providing for a commissioner to act in conjunction with a commissioner on the part of Virginia, and a third selected by these two, in determining the District of Columbia-Virginia boundary—their recommendations to be subject to ratification by Congress and Virginia; or

Act of June 15, 1858 (11 Stat. 310), authorizing commissioners on the part of the United States to act with commissioners on the part of Texas in surveying the boundary between Texas and the Territories of the United States. The boundary thus established, between Texas and the public-land strip, and Texas and New Mexico, was confirmed by act of March 3, 1891 (26 Stat. 971). And an attempted modification by New Mexico, on the formation of the State, was declared of no force and effect by joint resolution of February 16, 1911 (36 Stat. 1454).

A still different situation occurred in the case of Virginia and Kentucky. By an act of December 18, 1789, Virginia authorized the erection of the district of Kentucky into a new State. That act provided that "all private rights, and interests of lands within the said District derived from the laws of Virginia prior to such separation, shall remain valid and secure under the laws of the proposed State, and shall be determined by the laws now existing in this State." This compact was ratified by the convention which framed the constitution of Kentucky and was incorporated into that constitution. The act of Congress for the admission of Kentucky (Feb. 4, 1791, 1 Stat. 189) contained no express reference to the subject; and in Green v. Biddle (8 Wheat. 1) it was argued that the compact was invalid because made without the consent of Congress, contrary to the Constitution, article I, section 10. But the Supreme Court, after observing that the Constitution "makes no provision respecting the mode or form in which the consent of Congress is to be signified" and that the question in such cases is, "has Congress, by some positive act, in relation to such agreement, signified the consent of that body to its validity?" Found in the preamble to the act of 1791, with its reference to the act of Virginia of 1789 and the convention in Kentucky, sufficient indication, under the circumstances, of an assent to the terms of separation set out in the Virginia proposal—including the "compact" in question.

SPANISH COLONIAL MISSIONS

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to file a supplemental report on House Joint Resolution 211, to create a commission to study and report on the feasibility of establishing a national monument, or monuments, in the territory occupied by the Spanish Colonial Missions in the States of Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, and California.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Mexico?

There was no objection.

EXPLANATION OF VOTE

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce that my colleagues, Mr. BERLIN and Mr. HAINES, are unavoidably absent. Were they present, they would have voted "no" on the Treadway motion and would have voted "aye" on the Doughton motion.

MODERN PROBLEMS OF LAW ENFORCEMENT

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks by printing a speech of J. Edgar Hoover. I made this request yesterday, but under the rules of the Joint Committee on Printing, anything over two pages must be referred to the Joint Committee on Printing for an estimate. I have complied with that.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Reserving the right to object, what is the speech about?

Mr. CONNERY. It is a speech on crime. It is a speech made by J. Edgar Hoover at Atlantic City. I wish a copy of it could be in every home in the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of J. Edgar Hoover, Director Federal Bureau of Investigation, United States Department of Justice, before the convention of the International Association of Chiefs of Police at Atlantic City, N. J., July 9, 1935:

May I say with a great deal of pardonable pride that I look forward, throughout the year, to this appearance which I annually make before the International Association of Chiefs of Police. When mutual problems arise, I feel that I can save discussion of them for such a time as this and talk over these difficulties with men who themselves are familiar with such obstacles. In doing so, I know that I need make no lengthy explanations for a proper basis of understanding. I know that we stand upon a common ground. I know that I speak to my own people.

Therefore, this is not a speech. It is a discussion at a stated meeting place where men of experience get together to make use of that experience; a straight-from-the shoulder facing of facts as we know they must be faced. Here, at this meeting, a criminal is understood to be a criminal, with a gun in his hand and murder in his heart. It is not necessary here, in discussing what shall be done with that human rat, to persuade some altruistic soul that he is not a victim of environment or circumstances or inhibitions of malformed consciousness, to be reformed by a few kind words, a pat on the cheek and freedom at the earliest possible moment.

I feel that here I am bulwarked among friends, all of us sworn to stand against a group of dangerous enemies, who consistently attack efficient law-enforcement. So that there be no misunderstanding, let me list those enemies, call them by name: they are the criminals themselves and their friends and allies who are engaged of their own free will in the business of attempting to make crime pay. They are the shyster lawyers and other legal vermin who consort with criminals, guide them in their nefarious acts, hide them away after the crime is committed, use the blood money of law-breaking to bribe witnesses, dissemble evidence and, when possible, convert the judge and jury to a miscarriage of justice.

Beyond this, there is the legal shyster in law-making who, in meetings of bar associations and legislatures, cries out against every statute which aids the law-enforcement officer and works with fanatical zeal for laws which will hamper him. He orates loudly and blatantly upon the preservation of the constitutional rights of the criminal jackal and totally ignores the sacred and human rights of honest citizens. He is backed by the politician, crooked and otherwise, who is willing to trade the property, the well-being, the security, and even the lives of law-abiding persons for ballots spawned in prison cells, and the support of gutter scum. The bullets of the underworld are today poisoned by the verdigris of politics. The law-enforcement officer who seeks to do his duty has no weapon which can combat this venom, once it has been allowed to spread through the arteries of a community; there is no armor which can turn its vicious penetration.

Indeed, it would seem that such enemies were numerous enough and deadly enough without the addition of even a vaster army of antagonists. But there are more, and they are the ones who today form the greatest handicaps of all in the field of law enforcement. I refer to the sob sisters, the intruders, the uninformed and misinformed know-it-alls, the sentimentalists, and the alleged criminologists who believe that the individual is greater than society, that because any criminal can display or simulate even the slightest evidence of ordinary conduct, then, indeed, he must be a persecuted being, entitled to be sent forth anew into the world to again rob and plunder and murder. Why is it that these sentimentalists never think of the human wreckage left in the paths of such marauders? Why do they weep over the murderer and remain dry eyed at the thought of his slaughtered victim? Why must a man be thought good merely because he says he is good, when the facts of his career point to a constant succession of acts antagonistic to the peace and well-being of a community? I refer to the countless thousands of unregenerate criminals who, through the subversive acts of convict lovers, have been turned loose to prey anew upon communities often defenseless because the law-enforcement machinery has been lulled into the belief that these men were still in prison, when in truth they have been secretly released to again go forth upon a new series of depredations.

The time has come when we must look upon all persons who designedly or otherwise help the criminal as being enemies to society. There can be no middle ground. The sob sister who weeps over a kidnaper, and who through a desire for notoriety influences public opinion in favor of mercy for that foul body snatcher, is to my mind little better than the persons who must be punished for having aided, abetted, or harbored him. The fuss budget busybody who spends his or her time, for purposes of self-aggrandizement and a name as a philanthropist, in reducing the already too short sentences of rapists, murderers, kidnapers, and other outlaws, interferes seriously with the proper procedure of justice. The shyster who passes laws for the good of the criminal is no better than his professional brother who hides that criminal; the politician who stuffs his parasitical being upon the fruits of underworld votes is as much a type of vermin as the scum which casts its ballots according to his dictation. The time has come for all of us to look upon them for what they are—enemies to our cause and enemies to society.

To fight this concerted group entails a tremendous job—that of absolute and unflinching cooperation, not only between law-enforcement bodies, but within those bodies. The greatest ally of the criminally minded is looseness of method, bickerings between enforcement agencies, jealousies within organizations. Let us remember this, let us work toward the end that after all we are an army of many segments but with one goal—the protection of society and of ourselves.

For that reason, I like to think of the Federal Bureau of Investigation of the United States Department of Justice not only as an arm of the United States Government but as an agency, maintained by and for each and every State, every county, every cross-roads. There has been much publicity recently about the so-called "G men." Naturally our Bureau is proud of certain achievements. However, allow me to say that the results obtained could not have been realized without the whole-hearted and thorough cooperation of law-enforcement agencies spread throughout the length and breadth of America. To all of you I therefore express my deep gratitude and my pride that with the steady growth of cooperation between the enforcement arms of hamlet, village, city, Nation, and State, there appears upon the horizon a glow of hope, pointing to the day when again the majesty of the law shall be truly majestic, and the criminal reduced to the substratum where he rightfully belongs. May I add that in the Federal Bureau of Investigation it has been found that while crime does not pay, there are huge rewards in the relentless pursuit, apprehension, and punishment of criminals. During the past year, of all persons brought to trial through the investigative efforts of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, convictions were obtained in 94 percent of the cases. The cost of the Bureau for the fiscal year recently ended was approximately $4,680,000. During this time it effected recoveries of property and otherwise saved the taxpayers of America more than $38,000,000. For every dollar which went into crime chasing, more than $8 was brought in. The same sort of record can be made by any other law-enforcement agency of America which is allowed to concentrate upon crime, aided by every known practical and scientific method, plus freedom from influence and the degrading, disrupting burden of politics.

Only a short time ago, the Identification Division of the Federal Bureau of Investigation received its five millionth fingerprint record. Here is the greatest repository of factual criminal data in history, built through cooperation. It is not something which belongs alone to the Department of Justice. We are merely the custodians. It is your information bureau; you are the ones who built it to its present size and scope. Your officers risk their lives to arrest the more than 3,000 criminals whose fingerprint records are received daily in this great collection, which represents America's public enemies.

It is indeed cooperation when the law-enforcement bodies of the world can band together upon a common basis of action which steadily, day after day and month after month, brings about the identification of 50 percent of all persons arrested as having previous criminal records, and actually resulted in the past year in the location of 4,403 fugitives; 12 times a day somewhere in the United States some furtive lawbreaker is stripped of his aliases and revealed as a wanted felon because the law-enforcement bodies of the country have built up in Washington the greatest crook-catching device in the history of crime. Daily the fear of this Division grows in the mind of the criminal, he knows that here are witnesses who cannot be bribed, intimidated, or done away with. Even the agonies endured by such men as Dillinger in attempting to alter their finger tips, or those of the members of the Barker-Karpis gang who resorted to the actual slashing away of portions of their fingers have been found unavailing against the scientific manner in which fingerprint identification has been built up through your aid.

Likewise, the facilities of the crime laboratory of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, which was established in 1932, are yours. You are the men who furnish the evidence upon which to work; you are the men for whom this laboratory was conceived and built. The greater use you make of it, the greater will be its ability to aid and detect and apprehend.

Thus goes the story of the entire Federal Bureau of Investigation. It is not a mere law-enforcement body. It is an institution entrusted with the task of giving aid to crime prevention, to detection and apprehension everywhere. Every growth of investigative methods conceived here is yours for the asking. The aim of the Bureau is constantly centered upon the belief that no one unit of apprehension and detection can be self-sufficient. The effort must be a concerted one; the idea incessantly in view that crime no longer is local but nationalized, and that the nationalized methods are necessary to combat it.

Even the recent laws which have widened the powers of the Federal Bureau of Investigation were initiated not with the idea of usurping power from local agencies, but with the idea of giving aid to them. To this end no man in America deserves higher praise for his steady and conscientious efforts in the interests of law-enforcement than the Honorable Homer S. Cummings, Attorney General of the United States. It was through his genius and hard work that recent laws were devised and carried through to passage by Congress, centralizing effort in certain types of crimes which, through the growth of swift transportation, were becoming burdensome to local agencies.

Through his unfailing interest and his vision, it has been possible to build up the Federal Bureau of Investigation from a purely investigative agency to a militant one. It was he who brought about the condition of fear which now rules the underworld, the man who made it possible for the Federal Bureau of Investigation to obtain the arms, the ammunition, and the type of trained personnel to carry on a battle to the death, if necessary. That it has been successful is attested by the tombstone names of Wilbur Underhill; John Dillinger; Fred and Ma Barker; Russell Gibson, the kidnaper; "Pretty Boy" Floyd; "Baby Face" Nelson; and others.

The Attorney General's motivating idea throughout this entire plan of action has been that of useful cooperation with local law-enforcement agencies—in other words, to provide the most highly centralized agency possible, which acts as a coordinating agent for the police bodies of the Nation. In this connection, I feel sure that you all will agree with me that cooperation is as necessary from one side as it is from the other. With that cooperation functioning perfectly, marvelous results can be achieved; it has been through such close coordination that the Department of Justice, since the passing of the Lindbergh kidnaping statute in 1932, has been able to solve every one of the 50 cases brought to its attention, resulting in the conviction of 117 persons and the holding in custody of 22 more now awaiting trial. Sentences totaling 1,760 years have been assessed in addition to 24 life sentences, 4 death sentences, 3 culprits who committed suicide, 3 who died by murder at the hands of their gang members, and 4 who learned that you cannot bribe a bullet and who fell before the guns of fearless law-enforcement officers of Federal and local governments.

The record of extortion prosecutions is equally imposing, while that of the protection of national banks shows that since the passing of the law in May 1934, making it a Federal crime to rob a national bank or member bank of the Federal Reserve System, the number of bank robberies of this type dropped from 16 per month to 4 per month. This does not mean that the Federal Bureau of Investigation performed a superhuman task where others had failed. It does mean, however, that this Bureau was able to take the place of a central activating agency, cooperating with local agencies for the purpose of destroying the urge to rob banks. There are at present 65 persons in custody awaiting prosecutive action for this violation of law; 69 others have been convicted, 3 for life, and the others to terms totaling more than 1,616 years. Only one person has been acquitted. More than $125,000 in stolen money has been recovered. That all this was done in close cooperation with local officers is best evidenced by the fact that State trials have brought convictions to 24 persons, two of the sentences being for life; and seven bank robbers were killed by State officers.

Thus with cooperation becoming something vastly more practical than a mere theory, we are concerned with what can and must be done through that cooperation. You long ago have learned the usefulness of the Identification Division; the same field of aid lies before you in the crime laboratory. Here there are scientists and experts who are interested only in learning the truth. The testimony of a crime laboratory expert is unbiased; he has no personal interest in a case, and he is not in the business of testifying for money. To convict the guilty and acquit the innocent is his task; nothing can swerve him from that goal.

With the growth of scientific detection, the burden of laboratory work upon law-enforcement agencies daily grows greater. Likewise, there also increases the danger that commercial "crime laboratories" will more and more enter the picture of detection and apprehension, bringing about a repetition of the difficulties often experienced by expert testimony where evidence is given for hire. The Federal Bureau of Investigation crime laboratory does away with this danger. It is yours. Make the fullest use of it. There are no fees, no honorariums. The reward comes in sending a criminal to prison or an innocent man to freedom.

Our training methods are yours—we welcome their adoption in the law-enforcement bodies of the Nation. There is nothing secret about the manner in which the Federal Bureau of Investigation works. Its formula is a simple one—intensive training, highly efficient and carefully investigated personnel, rigid requirements in education, conduct, intelligence, ability to concentrate, alertness, zeal, and loyalty, plus careful schooling in which we do our utmost to make every man to a degree self-sufficient. He must be a good marksman and have the courage to shoot it out with the most venomous of public enemies. He must know how to take fingerprints and what to do with them afterward. He must learn that no clue, no matter how seemingly unimportant, can be overlooked. He must have constantly before him the fact that science is a bulwark of criminal investigation, and neglect no avenue toward this end. And he must realize that no case ever ends for the Federal Bureau of Investigation until it has been solved and closed by the conviction of the guilty or the acquittal of the innocent.

Therefore, we are shortly embarking upon an experiment for which I have great hopes—the installation of a police training school in the Federal Bureau of Investigation. With the opening date set for July 29, and with the beginning to be made on a limited scale until we have passed the experimental stage, the Attorney General hopes to provide in this police training school a university of police methods which may make the Bureau's most successful methods a part of the regulation police procedure in every part of the United States.

Selected police officials from State and local units may here receive a complete 3 months' course of intensive study in the technique of modern law enforcement. Naturally the vast resources of the Federal Bureau of Investigation will be thrown wide to them, but beyond this there shall be employed the services of outstanding men from universities, the field of criminology, and from police departments themselves.

There will be courses in fingerprinting, in the workings of the crime laboratory; practical field problems shall be studied, methods of attack, of surveillance, of gathering, preserving, and presenting evidence. The gun range of the United States Marine Corps at Quantico, Va., will be used for firearms training, the use of tear gas, riot guns, and machine guns. There will be practice in firing from speeding automobiles, and under conditions simulating those of actual battle.

Beyond this, the local problems of the police official will be thoroughly covered. There will be lectures on traffic control, on patrolling, report writing, court procedure, preparation of cases, and giving of evidence. The visiting official will be taught something of crime motivation, of neighborhood problems and of public relations. Police equipment will be lectured upon in all its branches—it is our aim to present in this police training school the answer to every problem which can arise in Federal, State, or local law-enforcement work. The course is free, police officers in attendance paying only their transportation and subsistence costs.

Our hope, of course, is that the men who undergo this course will return to their various communities equipped to spread their information among their departments; in other words to be missionaries from this university for a more advanced attack upon the crime problems of today. And I believe that one enlightening bit of study will be that portion of the course which treats of secrecy in the successful pursuit and apprehension of today's criminals. Through the employment of the nonpublicized methods of investigative technique the Federal Bureau of Investigation has achieved some of its most successful results.

This is especially true in kidnaping cases and others where the life or welfare of innocent persons is at stake, or where publicity may endanger the lives of local or Federal officers. Secrecy is the most hated word in the life of an outlaw. His best friends are those newspapers which, in their avidity to fulfill the ill-considered public desire for information, seek to publish every possible fact concerning an investigation. Time and again we all have seen efforts at important captures fall simply for the reason that a criminal bought a newspaper of this type and learned of the detailed plans to effect his apprehension.

We must give more attention to this need of secrecy. We must realize, after all, that our job is to capture criminals and not to make our efforts a running, day-by-day recital either of our methods, or actions, or aims or plans.

The impression may have been created by persons with an ax to grind that the Federal Bureau of Investigation desires to seize the glory of criminal catching. To that I answer that this Bureau is in the business of catching crooks—and that this is our sole business. No one knows better than we that the local police, where there is not inefficency, corruption, or headline hunters, and as deeply and seriously concerned with a crime as ourselves. It is to our interest and to the interest of all that recognition of local assistance be fair and just and honest. Therefore, it is my request that when you gentlemen who control the law-enforcement agencies of the Nation feel that you have justification to question why certain tactics are used by the Bureau in some case which arises in your locality, you talk to me personally about it. I am at your service and am only so far away as a telephone connection. Whether you be to the south, the north, the east or west, telephone me. The number is National 7117, Washington, D. C. Let us talk upon a common basis about something in which we are jointly interested, the catching of the criminal. The Federal Bureau of Investigation, I again repeat, is your agency, your clearing house. It should be as much a clearing house of ideas as of actions.

I have mentioned that our common basis is that of catching the criminal. It goes further than that. Our common basis is the public welfare, and to that end we must work in closest harmony. If I may suggest, there are certain goals which lie along the road and to which we should dedicate our most earnest efforts.

One is, of course, the outlawing of politics in all matters concerning the criminal. There should be determined fights on the part of law-enforcement bodies when some shyster legislator brings before a lawmaking body any statute which will further the interest of the criminal or make his apprehension and punishment more difficult. Law enforcement is in a fighting mood, and it must remain militant. When politics seeks to stay its hand by reduced appropriations, by red tape, by enforced appointments, I feel that the official who makes a fight against it will have the support of the public. Certainly this is true of the official who is brave enough to do what many members of the legal profession seemingly are afraid to do—I mean to make a determined effort to rid the communities of America of that filthy parasite of crime, the conniving, plotting, crime-aiding criminal attorney. We in law enforcement have given the legal profession of America many warnings and numerous opportunities to clean house. Those warnings in many cases have been disregarded and the opportunities have been flouted.

The successful prosecution of B. B. Laska, the Denver attorney, recently convicted of having aided the kidnapers of Charles F. Urshel, of Oklahoma, and the equally successful proceedings against Louis M. Piquett, politician-lawyer of Chicago, convicted of having harbored and abetted a member of the Dillinger gang, are evidences of what is to come in this regard. Here and now, for the benefit of crooked attorneys everywhere, I give them warning that the Federal Bureau of Investigation, whenever it receives the slightest bit of evidence tending to show that these criminal allies have sought to traduce justice through planning, plotting, or aiding in crimes, or by bribery, intimidation of witness, or other unlawful means, will follow such evidence down to the final shred. The Department of Justice has already placed a number of attorneys criminal where they belong. It intends to add to that list considerably.

There also is much work to be done in the field of civil fingerprinting. Already many good citizens of America have evinced interest in the efforts of forward-looking citizens to establish as large a civilian, noncriminal file as possible. It is a task of education in which I feel we should join for the good of society—certainly there could be no more interesting program for local civic organizations than a talk by your fingerprint expert upon fingerprinting in general and the advantages of contributing to the civilian file.

The number of persons who disappear each year, for instance, is amazing. In Los Angeles County alone last year 100 amnesia victims could not be identified and were committed to various institutions as nameless, helpless, friendless persons. If their fingerprints had been on file in Washington, identification would have been almost immediate. The potter's fields of the country yearly receive hundreds of bodies of the so-called "unknown dead." The term is incorrect—somewhere someone knows them, someone searches for them, someone loves them. They are the unidentified dead, often condemned to pauper burial merely because the marks of their fingers are not upon a pasteboard card. The criminal can be identified; the honest man cannot, thus thousands annually wander about the country afflicted by loss of memory; children disappear and are lost forever; daughters are lured from home to sink in disgrace because they are ashamed or fear to return when a welcome forgiveness awaits them. Much of this can be prevented by civil fingerprinting. Let us tell this story whenever possible. Let us point out the benefits to humanity of a central identification bureau where the deposition of fingerprints is the mark of an honest man. Let us show the benefits in business, in safety of travel, in rescue during time of illness or loss of memory. I believe the public will welcome it—and every effort exerted along this line means a lessening in the tremendous task which enforcement agencies must shoulder in the daily hunt for thousands upon thousands of missing persons. More than 5,000 a year disappear from Philadelphia, for instance; 3,000 from Los Angeles; a thousand from Portland, Oreg.; 2,200 from San Francisco; 13,000 from New York; 4,000 from St. Louis—other cities and towns range in proportion. Large numbers of them are found, of course, but only after arduous effort that would be reduced by a great percentage if the law-enforcement official had as his ally a set of identifying fingerprints on file at Washington.

Another problem of grave concern to us all is the ever-recurring one dealing with the extension of various forms of clemency to the criminal. No one in this assemblage, I feel sure, will scoff at the theory of parole and of rehabilitation. I said theory, not practice. There is a vast difference. The theory is beautiful. The practice approaches a national scandal.

It seems inconceivable that the people of America should be taxed the millions upon millions of dollars which they must annually pay for police, State constabularies, Federal enforcement bureaus, courts, penal institutions, and the like, only to have this expense become a mockery. It seems impossible that in an enlightened nation brave officers should be asked to face desperate criminals, to endure danger, injury, and even loss of life that those criminals be captured, only to see them turned loose to again resume their predatory careers. It seems unjust that the brave men of the Federal Bureau of Investigation must face their daily dangers, giving loyally of their years and sometimes of their life blood, unprotected by insurance, retirement pay, or adequate pensions for their widows if they fall on the field of battle, while throughout America millions of dollars are being squandered because of ill-considered, ignorant, or politically controlled parole and clemency actions which release dangerous men and women to prey upon society.

Parole and clemency advocates who love to talk of the beauties of "restricted liberty" as they like to call it, say that we have no parole problem. They say we point to isolated cases. Let them prove it. Let them show by case records where hardened criminals have been reformed after 3 and 4 and even 5 paroles, during which time they have been returned for new crimes.

Strangely enough, in spite of the foregoing remarks, I am an advocate of parole, the right kind of parole. I believe that parole was originated to give the first offender a chance to reform and rehabilitate himself. I believe that any man convicted of a crime should, if he displays reasonable desire to do so and providing his crime not be heinous, be given a chance to face the world anew. But when convicts with extensive records for offenses against society are turned out of prison cells for no other apparent reason than that they have asked for it, or that they have conducted themselves according to the rules of prison, then there is something wrong with America.

How can these State parole and pardon systems justify their actions when there are certain States which will not make the effort necessary to return parole violators, once those renegades have crossed the State line? It is apparent that there is throughout the entire Nation a woeful and, in some cases, absolute lack of any effort to find out what the paroled man does after he leaves prison. All this makes for a ghastly farce and no one knows it better than we who are intrusted with the safeguarding of society.

I repeat that this is a time when law enforcement must fight for its right to conquer the criminal world. To do this, it must combat the aids by which crime flourishes—easy parole, easy commutation, easy probation from sob-sister judges, and above all that monumental fake which has too long been perpetrated upon the American public—the prison sentence which says one thing and means another. There must be a campaign of education to teach the man in the street that he should not be lulled to peaceful acquiescence when a judge sentences a man to jail for 20 years, knowing full well that he will be out in 5.

The American citizen must be taught that prison sentences today are largely a matter of division and subtraction. The criminal knows it. He realizes only too well that scavenger legislative lawyers and soppy sentimentalists have tricked the statutes until today, granted that the criminal has brains enough to simulate good behavior and a desire to rebuild, this would mean that the maximum time this man will spend in prison is one-third of his sentence. Often it is not even that. I have in mind the cases of two criminals, well-known gangsters, robbers, pay-roll hold-up men, and sufficiently dangerous to be listed in the single fingerprint section of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. For their many crimes these men were sentenced respectively to 105 years and 145 years in prison. One escaped from a chain gang five times; the other escaped three. Both were freed within 6 years, and in the space of a few months had committed new crimes, including the robbery of a national bank.

The average murderer spends 10 years behind bars, and murder is supposed to be our greatest crime. Such procedure amounts to little more than subterfuge; law can have little majesty under such conditions. Let the public know the truth and I believe public opinion will rise to a point where sentimentalists, crooks, sob sisters, and convict lovers will be forced to give society a chance by sending prisoners to jail for the full amount of time they deserve to serve.

Thus we come to a discussion of what is justice. Late in May a young boy was kidnaped in a Pacific coast city. He was stolen from a school yard, forced into an automobile, held a prisoner in a pit, and bound in chains. Then he was dragged about the country cramped into the rear trunk of an automobile, after which he was incarcerated in a closet for days while his abductors wrung from the distraught parents the sum of $200,000. At last the money was paid, and the boy, his life forever shadowed by his inhuman treatment, returned to his home.

The homecoming was perhaps the most heart-rending event in the knowledge of the 70 or more experienced journalists and law-enforcement officials who were present. The curly-haired boy, cheerful in spite of his suffering, came out upon the lawn to meet these men and women, all of whom were veterans. They had seen train wrecks, floods, loss of life in accident and shipwreck; many had witnessed executions. They thought they were hard-boiled. Yet, as they viewed this young fellow, striving bravely to forget the ordeal through which he had passed, fighting like the fine, stalwart American boy that he is, to face life and win, despite this gaunt shadow which had crossed his path, there was not an eye which remained dry, not a throat unchoked, not a voice which failed to tremble. The fiends who had taken this youth, who had dared to blight a lustrous young life for the sake of blood money, would be adequately punished, they knew. Regrets were expressed that they could not be hung.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation began a hunt for these kidnapers. In the meantime, however, another search bore fruit, the chase to round up the last of the kidnapers of Edward G. Bremer in St. Paul. Volney Davis, a member of the Barker-Karpis gang, was captured. He pleaded guilty and was sentenced to life imprisonment. His crime had been participation in the stealing of an adult.

In the case of the young boy, Harmon M. Waley was arrested as one of the kidnapers. The arrest revealed that Waley had been a consistent violator of the law since the age of 16. He had been paroled not once but several times, only to violate his parole or commit new crimes. In fact, his parole history was so flagrant that the President of the United States demanded an investigation.

This foul body snatcher, Waley, had imperiled the life of a fine young boy. He had helped to extract a fortune from parents who had been forced into debt to pay the ransom. He had deliberately, maliciously, and fiendishly committed the worst crime that human brain can conceive. Yet his sentence was for but 45 years, a term often equaled in bank robbery cases.

Again I repeat that prison sentences are not sentences but problems in division and subtraction. Within 15 years, Harmon Metz Waley will be eligible for parole, his debt served for having stolen an innocent, defenseless child. Meanwhile Volney Davis, unless he also meets some munificent mercy, will have only begun to serve out that long life sentence for the stealing of an adult. Therefore, I ask, not in a spirit of criticism, of course, but merely from a standpoint of bewildered curiosity, what and where is justice?

INDIANS IN CALIFORNIA

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following request from the Senate of the United States:

SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
May 13 (calendar day May 31), 1935.

Ordered, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 1793) to amend the act entitled "An act authorizing the attorney general of the State of California to bring suit in the Court of Claims on behalf of the Indians of California", approved May 18, 1928 (45 Stat. L. 602).

The SPEAKER. Without objection the request will be granted.

There was no objection.

ADDITIONAL UNITED STATES JUDGES

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 5917) to appoint an additional circuit judge for the ninth judicial circuit and ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman from Virginia if this is the bill that was originally passed by the House providing for an additional circuit judge for the ninth district but which bill the Senate amended so as to provide for two more judges in California and making permanent in California a temporary appointment existing with reference to another Federal judge?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Substantially that is true.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I understood the gentleman from Virginia called up a conference report. Is that correct?

The SPEAKER. That is true.

Mr. SNELL. There can be no objection to calling up a conference report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asked permission that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

Mr. BLANTON. It is just a question of saving time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. TRUAX. I do not object to the reading of the report.

Mr. TABER. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read the conference report.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The Committee of Conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5917) having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, and 3, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the title of the bill, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the amended title proposed by the Senate, amend the title so as to read: "An Act to Provide for the Appointment of Additional United States Judges".; and the Senate agree to the same.

A. J. MONTAGUE,
WESLEY LLOYD,
U. S. GUYER,
Managers on the part of the House.

WILLIAM H. KING,
W. G. MCADOO,
WM. E. BORAH,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5917) to appoint an additional circuit judge for the ninth judicial district, submit the following written statement explaining the effect of the action agreed on by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report:

As it passed the House, this bill provided for the appointment of an additional circuit judge for the ninth circuit. The Senate made three amendments to the bill, which the House conferees accepted.

The first Senate amendment adds to the bill provisions for the appointment of two additional district judges for the southern district of California.

The second Senate amendment makes permanent an existing temporary judgeship in the southern California district created by the act of September 14, 1922. The act under which it was created provides that no vacancy occurring in this position can be filled without legislation by Congress.

The third Senate amendment authorizes the appointment of an additional district judge for the eastern district of Virginia. A separate bill for this purpose has already passed the House this session.

The title of the bill is amended to harmonize with its contents as amended.

A. J. MONTAGUE,
U. S. GUYER,
WESLEY LLOYD,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, is it the intention of the gentleman from Virginia to yield time on this conference report?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I should like to expedite it all I can, but I shall not object to a reasonable amount of discussion.

Mr. TABER. I think the House ought to know what it is about and ought to have an opportunity to discuss it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I shall be glad to state what it is about.

Mr. TABER. And will the gentleman be willing to yield time to those who are opposed to the proposition?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Virginia yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. There are two Federal judgeship bills. One is the bill of our colleague from Virginia, which involves only two States—a judge for Virginia and two for California, and the continuation of another there. There is another bill, however, which provides for about 15 Federal judges.

Mr. CELLER. No. I know the gentleman does not want to misstate it; it will make permanent temporary judgeships.

Mr. BLANTON. It involves about 15; and numerous Members on both sides of the aisle are against that bill. We do not want to get the two bills mixed.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is not this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. That is not this bill. The gentleman's bill merely provides for judges in California and Virginia.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Certainly.

Mr. MICHENER. It is rather difficult for us to hear the gentleman over here. Is this the omnibus judge bill or is this the Virginia bill?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will state to the gentleman that it is neither.

Mr. MICHENER. What is it?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Sometime since a bill passed this House creating an additional circuit judgeship in the ninth circuit. This bill went to the Senate, where two amendments were offered, I think by the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO] creating two additional district judgeships for the southern district of California, and also an amendment providing that a judge who has been long serving, I understand, should have his term made permanent, in keeping with the Constitution. The statement shows the fact. There was another amendment also, an amendment offered by Senator GLASS, of Virginia, creating an additional Federal judgeship for the eastern district of Virginia. These are the reasons the bill is back here.

Mr. MICHENER. As a matter of fact, all of these judgeships have been placed in this one bill; I do not care how they started, when you get down to brass tacks that is the situation.

Mr. MONTAGUE. When you get down to brass tacks only three judgeships are put into this bill in addition to making permanent a temporary one.

Mr. MICHENER. How many judgeships does this bill carry?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have stated that to the gentleman but I will state it again. It carries three new district judgeships, one of whom has already been approved by this House.

Mr. MICHENER. This is not the bill carrying the Arizona judgeship?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Not at all. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. O'MALLEY. This bill started out in the House creating one new judgeship?

Mr. MONTAGUE. The bill, as I understand it originated in the House creating one new circuit judgeship in California.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Now it comes back here with three tacked on?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Two tacked onto the bill passed by the House, and one additional, allowing a judge to the eastern district of Virginia, which has heretofore passed the House.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman speaks of an investigation by the Supreme Court made a number of years ago. Congress set up a Judicial Council, consisting of the members of the Supreme Court and the presiding judge of each circuit. This Council meets once a year. It has been the policy of the Judiciary Committee of the House to give attention to the recommendations of the Judicial Council, and the Judiciary Committee has done that regardless of political consideration and regardless of who is in power. I believe that policy should be carried on. Take Massachusetts, for instance, they should have an additional judge. All the facts show they should have an additional judge, because the business of the Federal court there is away behind. When the Attorney General, regardless of politics, and the Judicial Council, which surely is not partisan, reports that a district needs and must have additional help, it seems to me that we should cut out all logrolling and partisanship and allow these additional judgeships if we find that the recommendations are justified. Needed judges should not be denied because some Senator insists that there will be no bill unless he gets a judge for his State. I think we should allow these judgeships where they are needed. Necessity should be our guide. Michigan needs a judge to take the place of Judge Simmons, who has been promoted to the circuit bench. This is not a new judgeship, but this judgeship lapsed upon this promotion. The Judicial Council asks that Michigan's vacancy be filled, but I am ready to vote against a judge for Michigan if the price is to be unnecessary judges in other States. I think that should be the attitude of the Congress. Political logrolling has no place when dealing with the judiciary.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I may say to the gentleman from Michigan that the pending bill does not have anything to do with the judgeship in Michigan at all.

Mr. MICHENER. I know it does not, but the other bill does.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I yield.

Mr. PIERCE. Suppose this conference report is voted down then what happens with respect to the circuit judge for the ninth district and the district judge for the Virginia district. We passed both of those bills, and now they have passed them in the Senate, have they not?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. That is a very easy question to answer from a parliamentary standpoint. We can insist on our disagreement to the Senate amendments and send it back and provide for a district judge in Virginia.

Mr. PIERCE. We passed a bill providing for a circuit judge for the ninth district.

Mr. O'CONNOR. And they have put in three judges for California.

Mr. PIERCE. I am talking about the circuit judgeship.

Mr. KRAMER. There are only two additional judges provided for California.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, they are undertaking to gang Judge MONTAGUE'S bill.

The argument made against the bill is absolutely unfair. There are two distinct bills before this House. Let us see what the facts are. They are not going to let any of these bills go through, they say. Who are "they"? My distinguished friend from New York, whom I respect—and I appeal from him to the House that controls its own business. What are the facts?

The facts are that Judge MONTAGUE introduced a bill which went to the Judiciary Committee; the committee approved the bill and the House approved the bill. That is one proposition.

The second proposition is Mr. LLOYD introduced a bill taking care of the ninth circuit. The Judiciary Committee approved it; it passed the House and went to the Senate. That is the second proposition.

When the two bills got into the Senate there was a proposition in the Senate for two additional district judges in California, who seem to be referred to by my distinguished friend from New York as Republican judges. We hope that if we get the two more judges we will get in a couple of Democrats. [Laughter.]

Mr. YOUNG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. For a quick question.

Mr. YOUNG. The gentleman refers to this as Judge MONTAGUE'S bill.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Never mind that. I cannot go into that now, however.

Mr. YOUNG. The entire character of the bill has been changed.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I am giving the House a square statement about the facts. I stated clearly that Judge MONTAGUE introduced a bill. Mr. LLOYD introduced a bill, so that the Senate had two bills before it, and they put in two additional judges from California, as the Senate had a perfect right to do.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? The gentleman mentioned my name.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I think the gentleman intimated that I said something about Republican judges. I do not recall that I mentioned Republican judges.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. If the gentleman will look at the RECORD tomorrow, he will recall it.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I am sure it is not in the RECORD. I never mentioned Republican or Democratic judges.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Oh, yes, the gentleman did.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Very well; if I did, I did. I am just as much opposed to Democratic Federal judges as Republican Federal judges. I am for Judge MONTAGUE'S bill and for Mr. LLOYD'S bill.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. With regard to these two judges in California, we want to be sensible about the matter. There is not anybody, Democrat or Republican, who will not agree that the record with regard to the southern district of California shows that they need these judges out there. I do not believe there is a single human being, man or woman, who will take his or her place in the Well of the House and state on his own responsibility that the record does now show conclusively that those two judges are needed to carry forward the public business.

Mr. YOUNG. In that event why did not the gentleman's committee report a bill for the creation of those two judges?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Never mind that now.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. If there is any challenge to my statement, I yield.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 3 minutes more.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Did the gentleman ever hear of a United States district or circuit judge who was not overcrowded with work? I never did.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I have, and I make this statement. I do not believe anybody who will examine the situation in California but will say that they need these two new judges. That is my judgment. We want this report voted either up or down on its merits. It is not fair in the consideration of this conference report to be talking about 13 other judges.

It is not fair or good sportsmanship or a good legislative way of handling business. We have an arrangement under which the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court and the presiding justices of each of the circuits come in here and go over the business of the courts. They have gone over the business of the southern district of California and recommended these judges. What has happened? Nothing, except that the Senate, a responsible part of the legislative branch of the Government, added two California judges, which is a good thing to add to the bill, we thought. That is all there is to this report.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Shoot it fast.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Did the House Judiciary Committee study the need for these two additional judges?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I did, and I think the other members did. I do not think there is any disagreement about that.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Did your committee report a bill out?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. No. What are we going to do about it now? What is the sensible thing to do about it? Are you going to beat Judge MONTAGUE's bill on the statement of my good friend from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR]? I could take care of that statement if it were pertinent, with regard to good sportsmanship. I helped bring that bill in. I do not want to take any more time, but I do not want to see such tactics resorted to against Judge MONTAGUE's bill on the floor of this House.

Mr. YOUNG. But no one on the floor of the House now is in a position to give us information as to whether or not the present district judges in the southern district of California are on the job or on vacation or how much time they have devoted to their work; and how can we pass on the merits of this unless the gentleman's committee gives us that information?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 2 minutes more.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I have not the figures, and I do not know whether the California Members have them or not, but I say on my own responsibility that the figures that I have examined and which the other members of the committee have examined show the need for these two judges. Of course, we have not any way on earth of trailing these judges and seeing whether they sit on the bench all of the time they should sit there. The Attorney General thinks they ought to have these judges, and the Chief Justice thinks we ought to have these judges.

Mr. YOUNG. But they ought to be on the job all of the time, because they are the only officeholders in this country who did not take a cut in pay when everybody else did.

Mr. KRAMER. Is it not a fact that continuously they have had judges come in from other districts to help out in southern California?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes. I will not take any more time. [Applause.]

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who do not believe in creating any unnecessary Federal judges, and I appeal now to my colleagues who have made that fight with me in this House not to be prejudiced against a meritorious bill.

I believe that every bill ought to be fought out on this floor on its own merits. What is this bill? The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] stated it clearly and distinctly. This is not the Montague bill; it is the Lloyd bill. It went from this House creating a new judge for the ninth district of California. There was also a bill passed here by my colleague Mr. MONTAGUE to create a judge for the eastern district of Virginia, which passed the House. Both were meritorious bills.

Those two bills went to the Senate. The Senate took this Lloyd bill and added Judge MONTAGUE's bill on it as an amendment. So if you vote down the Senate amendment, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] advises you to do, you do not pass the Montague bill at all, but you kill it. So you cannot vote down the Senate amendment and pass the Montague bill.

Now, I want to say this on behalf of those two new judges in California. If you will look up California's record you will find that California, comparable to other States of its size, has more new people today, both registered under the census and not registered under the census, than any other State in the Union. The reports that I am getting today are that there are nearly a million people in California who have gotten in there who are not registered at all under the census. They all have to be handled by the courts, for most of them are aliens.

I am one who does not want to see new Federal judgeships created when they are not necessary. I have fought against it. I am nevertheless one Member of this House who believes that they have done right in providing for these two new judgeships in California. [Applause.] I am willing to vote for this bill as it stands on its own merits. Then when the other bill comes up we will look after it on its merits.

I heard a prominent member of the great Ways and Means Committee a few minutes ago say that if there were going to be any votes against the 15-judge bill, he was not going to let this judge bill pass. I voted to put that gentleman on one of the biggest committees in this House, because I liked him and I then thought he was a man of pretty sound judgment. I voted to put him on our great Ways and Means Committee. Hence I was very much surprised to hear him say that if there were going to be any votes against the 15-judge bill, in which he was interested, he would not let any other new judge bill pass. That is not the kind of a statement that a distinguished member of the Ways and Means Committee of this House ought to make. He ought to be bigger than that. He ought to be broader than that. He ought to have better judgment than that. He ought to be more equitable than that to his colleagues and to the various districts of the country. I still have confidence in him, and I would vote again to place him on the Ways and Means Committee, notwithstanding his impulsive statement.

Mr. TARVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Not just at this moment. I regret I have not the time to yield.

I have served with my distinguished colleague from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] since the war days. He is one of the most lovable characters in this House. [Applause.] He is one of the great men of this country. [Applause.] He has been Governor of the great Commonwealth of Virginia. He has the confidence of the people. He has rendered a distinctive service to the people of his Nation here in the Congress of the United States. [Applause.] This is his bill. Are we going to kill it; are we going to "Ohio it to death" with these talks simply because we are prejudiced against new judges?

I am one who took the floor against that 21-judge bill back in 1922, and if you will refer to my speech made in 1922 against that bill you will see that I quoted one of the strongest speeches against unnecessary judges that was ever made on this floor, made by the Chairman of our great Committee on the Judiciary [Mr. SUMNERS]. His splendid speech made in a former session against creating new unnecessary judgeships was unanswerable.

Chairman SUMNERS of Texas in that speech spoke about the then conditions out in Arizona where the judge was busy only a few months in the year. He then spoke of the then conditions in Colorado. Today that one judge out in Colorado recently has been trying cases in New York City. He was not busy out in Colorado, so they sent for him to help them out in New York City.

Let us pass this Montague bill. Let us give the eastern district of Virginia its judgeship, and let us at the same time do right and justice by California. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] has expired.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL].

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, in 1933 I introduced a bill providing for a Federal judge in the eastern district of Michigan. At the beginning of the Seventy-fourth Congress the same bill was resubmitted. It was on the strength of appeals from the citizens of Detroit and of Michigan, supported by the entire bench of Federal judges located at Detroit that I introduced the bill known as "H. R. 2761." I think the fact that an additional judge is needed is borne out by the support that we have from the Judicial Council and the information that we have from the Supreme Court on the need for the reestablishment of what was at one time a temporary judgeship. However, my bill provided for a permanent, new judgeship, regardless of that temporary place which was unfilled since Judge Simmons was sent to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals at Cincinnati.

Now, I am for the bill offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE]. I never said I was opposed to it. I am for his bill on its merits. I feel that California, in view of the information we have, is entitled to have additional Federal judgeships; but at the same time I want to stress that we in Michigan need an additional judge as much or possibly even more than you need one in Virginia, or as much as you need two in California. Detroit is the fourth largest city in the United States and the eastern district of Michigan is one of the largest and most important, having a volume of legal business so great that the docket is completely swamped. It is not a matter of any personal pride or any desire on my part to obtain a new judge or slip in a Democrat to fill the place. It is an absolute necessity. It is a matter of public need to clear the docket at the earliest possible time.

My bill has been included in the omnibus bill, and I hope that this House will be fair enough to at least dissociate the instances where a nunfair advantage is being taken and support the remainder of the bill purely on its merits. In the meantime, I want to assure the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] that I am not only not opposed to his bill but I am absolutely in favor of it. Any quotation of me to the contrary is entirely erroneous. I shall present the House with the necessary and substantiating fact when the omnibus bill is up for consideration.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the unused portion of my time.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA].

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Speaker, there is a simple principle that should determine the creation of a judgeship in any district; that is, whether or not the judge is needed. The question as to the need for the additional judges in California has been established as fully as it could be established anywhere. The highest authority on that question in the United States should be the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, Mr. Hughes. Speaking at the American Law Institute in May of this year, Judge Hughes said:

> In the southern district of California this average interval for all classes of cases is from 18 to 24 months. This is a condition which ought not to continue.

Then referring to the fact that the Judicial Conference had recommended these judges for California, he continued:

> It is idle to talk of reforms if judicial administration, which underlies the enforcement of all laws, is not kept adequate and sufficient.

The gentleman from New York made a speech a few minutes ago in which he claimed that the hands of Congress are tied because of some alleged legislative agreement, some gentlemen's agreement, made in 1921. I have great respect for the gentleman from New York, but I think he is talking nonsense to the House when he advances any such argument. The idea that in 1921 a few men in Congress could get together and have some personal understanding about what should be done in the future and that in 1935 we should find ourselves debarred from doing the sensible, the just thing in this matter is nonsense, with all due respect to my good friend from New York. The whole Congress in 1921, even by unanimous vote, would not bind the Congress of 1935. Then how could a few Members by any gentlemen's agreement in 1921 attempt to bind Congress in 1935.

In southern California the population increased 65 percent from 1920 to 1930. The situation today is entirely different from what it was in 1921. Would any sensible man for one moment contend that we should be bound today by the conditions which existed 14 years ago?

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEA of California. I yield.

Mr. TARVER. Would it not have been more nearly fair to have brought the California bill before the House as a separate proposition, to have allowed the House to pass on whether or not these judgeships were justified apart from the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia? Why was it advisable to tie it onto this bill in the Senate, having failed to get a favorable report from the House Judiciary Committee?

Mr. LEA of California. The gentleman refers to a question of procedure which does not relate to the merits.

Mr. TARVER. I say it has very great relation to the merits. I want to know why it was not thought advisable to bring the California proposition before the House separately and apart from the proposition for Virginia?

Mr. LEA of California. We have not had the legislative opportunity. We had to avail ourselves of the legislative opportunity that was afforded. We have not asked that it be considered on any other ground than its merits. There is a real need for these judges out there on the coast, and no argument to the contrary has been advanced. The attempt is to defeat the bill for a reason not going to its merits.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEA of California. I yield.

Mr. PIERCE. How many judges have you in southern California now?

Mr. LEA of California. Four.

Mr. PIERCE. And how great is the population?

Mr. LEA of California. We have over 6,000,000 people in the State.

Mr. PIERCE. How many people are there in the northern district?

Mr. LEA of California. The population there is less than 3,000,000.

Mr. PIERCE. How many judges are there in the northern district?

Mr. LEA of California. Three.

Mr. PIERCE. You have 7 judges, then, for about 8,000,000 people?

Mr. LEA of California. Yes; or over 6,000,000 people.

Mr. PIERCE. We are crowded up in Oregon. I was asking for one more judge. We have only a little over 1,000,000 people with 2 judges.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEA of California. I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. What difference does it make how these bills got before us? If the judges are needed, we ought to pass the legislation.

Mr. LEA of California. The statement of the gentleman is so manifestly sensible that I do not see how any man can think otherwise.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HEALEY].

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Speaker, I merely want to reiterate the statement of one of the gentlemen who preceded me, that the argument made against this bill of the gentleman from Virginia was most unfair, for it brought in objections to another bill not under consideration at this time. The purpose, of course, was obvious.

This bill of the gentleman from Virginia for the creation of a judgeship in Virginia came before a subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary, which sat especially for the purpose of considering these various judgeship bills which have been introduced by Members of the House. I want to correct the statement that has been made previously that some of these bills were not even introduced by Members of the House. A check up I am confident will show that all these bills were introduced by Members of the House. This bill was favorably considered by the subcommittee and reported to the full committee, by which it was presented to the House and passed by the House. Ample evidence was presented to the subcommittee and to the full committee to justify its favorable report for an additional judgeship in the ninth circuit. The Senate added on the two judgeships for California. The House Committee on the Judiciary has a number of these bills that have been presented by Members of Congress representing various States. The reason the bill for the California judges had not been previously reported to the House is due to the fact that the committee has not had the opportunity to study that particular bill. After reviewing the figures, however, the committee is convinced, and the chairman of the committee so stated in his speech, that California has made a showing that justifies the appointment of these judges.

As for the omnibus bill that may come up for consideration a little later, and which has been so unfairly and unjustly attacked, I merely want to make a brief statement. I introduced a bill for a judgeship in Massachusetts that was reported by the Judiciary Committee and passed by the House. The Senate added on the amendment, which will, if the conference report is adopted, make permanent 15 judgeships which are now temporary ones. This bill will not create a solitary new judgeship. We have a population of 4,300,000 in Massachusetts and have only two Federal district judges—fewer judges than any other State in this Union of even a comparable population. When the omnibus judgeship bill is presented to the House I am sure we can show sufficient justification for the adoption of the conference report which seeks to make permanent these temporary judgeships.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. McFARLANE].

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, so that we will clearly understand the matter before us, may I say that it involves the question of creating and making permanent four additional Federal judgeships? According to the Attorney General's report of 1934, page 187, it costs the Government an average of $71,425.06 for the operation of each circuit court and Federal district court we have today. We have 41 circuit judges and 150 district judges in the United States, Alaska, and District of Columbia, and to increase this number four will add an expense of $285,700.24 to the already overburdened taxpayers. These courts are not needed; what we should do is redistrict and put our present courts to work. The Attorney General's report shows there were 135,128 cases commenced in 1933 and only 70,111 commenced in 1934, while there were 138,598 cases terminated in 1933, and only 90,091 terminated in 1934. There were 82,839 cases left pending in 1933 and 62,832 left pending in 1934. If these courts had disposed of as many cases in 1934 as they did in 1933 they would have pending only 14,325 instead of 62,832, which was 20,007 cases less than there was left pending in 1933. If our present judges would stay on the job and work we would not need any new courts. If you will refer to the bill that will come up next, which is Senate 481, the omnibus court bill, it will be found that the bill makes permanent 15 additional district judgeships.

Mr. HEALEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFARLANE. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. HEALEY. May I tell the gentleman, so that he will have the correct information, that it does not create a solitary new judgeship.

Mr. McFARLANE. Out of these 15?

Mr. HEALEY. Not one.

Mr. McFARLANE. That may be true, but the bill at least makes permanent 15 temporary courts that will expire with the death of the present occupant of the chair, and according to the records I have just quoted all of these courts should be allowed to expire. The big excuse for creating these courts back in 1921–22 was on account of prohibition. Now that prohibition has been repealed these courts should not be needed further. And according to the records these southern California judges have disposed of less cases the last 3 years than any other judges in the country except Iowa and Massachusetts.

I notice the bill provides for 2 for Massachusetts, 3 for New York, 1 for Pennsylvania, 1 for Michigan, 2 for Missouri, 1 for Ohio, another one for California, and they will get 3 out of this transaction; 1 for Minnesota; 2 for Texas; and 1 for Arizona.

So with all this logrolling, do not be surprised when the boys go to buttonholing you and saying, "Now, you scratch my back and I will scratch yours, and we will raid the Treasury for another $1,071,375.90 to create and make permanent these additional 15 judgeships", and all this when there has been no information given showing any justification for any such procedure. The Attorney General recommends two additional district judgeships for California and New York, but this pending bill gives California three additional judges and Virginia one, to say nothing of the omnibus bill that sprinkles 15 judgeships throughout the country as above indicated. Both of these bills should be defeated and save this $1,357,076.14.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. McFARLANE] said there has been no investigation made as to the number of cases tried, and so forth. I may say that this information was before the committee and is contained in the report of the Judicial Council, as well as the report of the Attorney General, which is in printed form. If the gentleman from Texas will refer to that report, he will find all the information which he seeks.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentlewoman from Arizona [Mrs. GREENWAY].

Mrs. GREENWAY. Mr. Speaker, if, quoting the gentleman from Texas, "they are ganging up" on the Virginia Federal judgeship, certainly they have been "picking" on Arizona. It would be thought that we were a trailer attached to an automobile bigger than the automobile itself. The answer to the question asked by the gentleman from Texas I hold in my hand, and if I had more than 1 minute I would give the House the full information.

To include Arizona as a State that might not need a second judge is unjust. These are the amazing and interesting figures: Based on the cases of the last 3 years, if Arizona is not given an additional judge, the one Federal judge will have an average of 1,109 cases a year, whereas the 3-year average for cases per judge, based on United States civil, criminal, and private cases, for 1932, 1933, and 1934 are as follows:

	3-year average	If Arizona excluded from proposed legislation
		Number judges	Average per judge
Arizona	1,109	1	1,109
Minnesota	2,769	4	692
Massachusetts	1,603	3	534
Southern New York	9,367	11	851
Eastern New York	4,378	6	730
Western Pennsylvania	2,227	3	742
Eastern Michigan	2,653	4	663
Eastern Missouri	1,489	2	744
Western Missouri	1,874	2	937
Northern Ohio	1,788	3	596
Southern California	2,376	4	594
Northern Texas	3,070	3	1,023
Southern Iowa	491	1	491

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX].

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I believe that I am the second Member of the House to speak on this bill who is not a lawyer. Perhaps it makes a difference in viewpoint. I may say that in the State of Ohio there is a population of 7,000,000 people. We have five United States district judges who are doing the work in Ohio and doing it well. Ohio does not need an additional United States district judge today. Ohio is not asking for an additional judge. When these gentlemen say that the State of California, with a population of 6,000,000 people has eight Federal judges, in my humble opinion, an additional judge is not needed out there.

Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the bill offered by the gentleman from Virginia. I offered an amendment to the bill when it was pending before this House, which amendment was voted down. I think the bill is a good, meritorious bill, and I would ask the distinguished gentleman from Virginia whether or not he would be willing to separate his bill from this other bill, which ignores all ethics of legislative procedure.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. McFARLANE. If we vote this down, we can send it to conference and work out a bill satisfactory to the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. TRUAX. That is what we ought to do. Let us vote down the conference report and send it back from whence it emanated, and then we can adopt the bill as offered by the gentleman from Virginia, which ought to be adopted. We will then end once and for all this grab bag of judgeships by the other body of this Congress, which is unwarranted and unjustified. I say vote down the conference report.

All progressives and liberals in Congress should be unalterably opposed to the present system of creating judgeships, appointing judges, and countenancing their life tenure of office. They should be opposed to the creation of any new judgeships; they should be opposed to the rate of salary, namely, $10,000 per year. They should be opposed to any appointment that is effective for a period longer than 4 years. If they are appointed to terms longer than 4 years, as is now the case, they are not responsible to the common people. They are responsible only to their lifelong training and environment. They are responsible only to the cold analytical minds of their legal profession. They look not upon suffering humanity with sympathetic eyes. They view cases of human misery and suffering only through the yellow, musty pages of age-old law books and constitutions.

The legal fraternity invariably believes in and administers a government of the lawyers, by the lawyers, and for the lawyers. Many lawyers in Congress look upon such matters as only a means to an end for their own personal ambitions and desires. They look upon these measures as a vehicle which at some time can be used to transport themselves into a judicial court, sit upon a judicial throne, and reign there for life at $10,000 a year.

Never a thought give they to the real needs of their country. Never a thought do they exhibit for the problems of the wage workers, farmers, and soldiers. A bounteous fine salary of $10,000 a year for life does not tend to produce nor create humanitarians. It only tends to produce and perpetuate an oligarchy of the judiciary—a dictatorship of the courts—a regime of the courts, by the courts, and for the courts.

The overwhelming sentiments of the common people indicate that we now have too many judges. We ought to rid ourselves of some instead of adding more judges to the pay rolls. More than 150 United States district judges are sitting on the various benches of the country drawing salaries of $10,000 per year, yet we are confronted with the astounding knowledge that not one of these United States district judges voluntarily took a cut in his salary when the National Economy Act was passed by Congress which emasculated the pensions of war veterans and reduced the salaries of Federal employees. Personally, I objected not to the reduction in the salaries of Members of Congress. I did object to, and resented with all the forces at my command, the emasculation of pensions of war veterans. I am happy to state that I voted "r o" on the famous so-called "Economy Act", and voted upon each and every occasion for restoration of pensions of war veterans.

Not a single iota of evidence has been presented during the consideration of this bill to justify the need for additional judges in the State of California. I am told that the State of California now has eight such judges on the bench drawing salaries of $10,000 a year, and, if this bill is passed, the State of California will be given two more district judges making a total of 10 district judges drawing a salary of $10,000 per year for the State of California, with a population of 6,000,000.

I beg to contrast this unjustified situation with my own State of Ohio where the courts function well for 7,000,000 people with a total of five United States district judges on salaries of $10,000 per year. I am glad to state that as yet the Ohio courts have not nullified nor negatived the acts of Congress as has been done by judges in other States. The courts have set themselves up as the ruling bodies of the United States. They unconstitutionally and unjustifiedly set up their own dictatorship and take upon their shoulders the illegitimate power to veto the acts of Congress and the State legislative bodies.

I would have the people of this country know that we may expect other judicial bills from the Committee on the Judiciary. We must expect an omnibus bill that carries with it authorizations for the creation of 15 more United States district judgeships. That means that $150,000 per year burden will be added to the backs of the taxpayers. That means that 15 more lawyers of the country will be placed upon the judicial throne, that 15 more lawyers will be placed on the bench, where they can look with contempt upon the struggles of those who live by the sweat of their brows.

Your attention is directed to the undisputable fact that the prohibition era and the Hoover panic and its consequent prolonged depression are responsible for a large portion of the work performed by United States district courts today. Thousands of cases of equity, thousands of bankruptcy cases must come within their purview. With prohibition a thing of the past, with the country out on its way from the depression, with the farmers again rehabilitated, with workmen back at their jobs, then these Federal courts will not have half as much work to do as they have today.

It is a custom of the courts in this country to take arbitrarily a long summer vacation. Let these men work 12 months of the year as do men of other vocations, of other professions, of other businesses, then there will be no surplus of cases on their dockets, they will clean up their work. Let them work the same as others work and the surplus will be a thing of the past and there will be no clamor, hue, and cry for more judges at $10,000 per year holding office for life. Let our slogan be "Less judges, harder work, and more decisions in the interest of the common people." [Applause.]

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, this is a rather anomalous situation, where everyone professes to favor the bill but wishes to kill it by a process of parliamentary legerdemain.

Of the merit of the bill there can be no dispute. The method by which additional judgeships got into the bill is aside the case. The merits of the bill itself, however, do not admit of any criticism. The California judges have been recommended by the highest judicial council of the Nation. Proper investigation has been made. That is true also of the circuit judge.

Mr. Speaker, so far as the district judge for my State is concerned, I do not desire to trespass upon the patience of the House any longer.

Mr. YOUNG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. YOUNG. I know this to be a fact, but I would like to ask the gentleman the question because he is a distinguished member of the Judiciary Committee. Is it not a fact that the two United States district judges for the northern district of Ohio disposed last year of more cases than any two of the present district judges for the southern district of California? If those judges out there would work more, judges would not be needed.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I answer the gentleman in this way: We cannot pass upon personal equations. Perhaps one man in this House does more work than four others.

Mr. YOUNG. If these California judges would do the work, they would not need to have intruded them on the gentleman's bill, which was a proper one.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. YOUNG) there were—ayes 126, noes 22.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, I challenge the vote on the ground there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is not a quorum present.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 254, nays 43, not voting 132, as follows:

THE POLICIES OF THE ROOSEVELT ADMINISTRATION

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, where is America headed? What are her dictators doing to her? What are her dictators doing to the American workingman? Where is America's standard of living?

These are questions which it is time for patriotic Americans to talk about. These are questions to the seriousness of which the American people must be aroused if there is to be any liberty, if there is to be any security, if there is to be any opportunity for the man in America who wants to make something of himself by work, if we are to maintain the standards of living of America.

That the policies of the Roosevelt administration would throw us into a panic, the like of which this country had never seen, began to be evident by January 1, 1933. That such policies were deliberately designed to create that situation did not appear so clear at the time. It simply appeared that there was a lack of a sense of responsibility, a lack of balance, a lack of appreciation of the campaign promises of stable constitutional government which Roosevelt had made on the stump in the 1932 campaign and to which the old-fashioned Democratic Party was always committed. It became apparent after the inauguration on March the 4th that an attempt was to be made by the administration to create a dictatorship, to take away from the Congress all of its authority and have it delegated to the President.

A frightened Roosevelt administration did pass the Emergency Banking Act and other bills to reduce the expenses of the Government, which, in a measure, caused a business upturn in May and June 1933, but on May 12, 1933, the A. A. A. bill was passed and on June 16, 1933, the N. R. A. bill was passed, delegating enormous powers to the Executive and making him practically a dictator and fooling away billions of dollars of the people's money.

On July 7, 1933, the A. A. A. was proclaimed effective. Processing taxes were levied on farm products despite the fact that Mr. Roosevelt had many times said there never should be taxes on food or clothes, and in 3 weeks the price of wheat dropped from $1.25 a bushel to 95 cents, just the amount of the processing tax.

On July 15, the N. R. A. was proclaimed. The N. R. A. created an overlordship of business. It raised prices, stopped production, threw many out of work, and reduced the size of the pay envelops of those whose jobs were left. During all of these times the number of people out of work has increased. On July 15, 1933, the publication, Weekly Survey of Current Business, published by the United States Department of Commerce, showed for business activity a figure of 100, from a low of 60 in March 1933. From July 15, 1933 on, there was a continuous decline until on November 1, 1933, it had reached a figure of 70. There was a slight increase in the rest of 1933 and through 1934 the figure hovered around 80. At the end of 1934 the figure became about 83. It started in 1935 with a little higher level, but it has now gone down to practically 80 and the business activity curve is now below both the 1933 and 1934 levels for this month. Unemployment figures are at their highest. Relief expenditures will this year reach a figure of $150,000,000 for the month of June 1935, as against approximately $100,000,000 in 1934.

Relief is administered in a high-handed, political, extravagant, and thoroughly incompetent manner. It is carried on with the idea of preventing the people from going to work. If we could have relief administered by local people unhampered by the high-handedness and the proven incompetence of Harry Hopkins we could better meet the needs of the people and save money.

We now have a scheme of spending $2,000,000,000 putting people to work on foolish projects which are not useful, under the leadership of Harry Hopkins, the renowned Socialist. This will further demoralize our people, because when a man is working at something that is not useful he has no heart in it. It has a worse effect on the morale of the people even than direct relief.

The number of people upon relief has risen from a figure of 15,750,000 in March 1933, to 22,000,000 in March 1935, and it cannot be much below that now. This administration is completely destroying the morale of our people, destroying their reserves set up for old age and emergencies, and throwing them bodily on relief.

To make this situation more acute, the administration, with the deliberate idea of throwing more people out of work has entered into reciprocal-trade agreements with other countries to let their farm products and other goods into this country at lower rates of duty, and has thereby thrown more people out of work. The purpose of this reciprocal-tariff scheme, according to Secretary Wallace, as appears in his testimony before the Ways and Means Committee on the 8th of March 1934 on pages 45 to 61 of the hearings, was to get rid of those industries which paid higher wages than were paid in foreign countries for the same work.

At the same time that the A. A. A. is attempting to reduce production of cotton, corn, and wheat, the Senate is passing a bill designed to appropriate $1,000,000,000, and add that to our debt, to set up the tenant farmers in business so they can raise more wheat, cotton, and corn. We are also having many hundreds of millions of dollars fooled away on irrigation projects designed to put more land under cultivation to raise corn, cotton, and wheat. This is but evidence of the contradictory policies of the Roosevelt administration.

Roosevelt promised us economy. He has spent, in a little over the 2 years since his inauguration, approximately $16,000,000,000, and this includes the postal deficiency, but not the postal-revenue expenditures; and the revenues of the Government in that time have been less than $7,000,000,000. We have added to the national debt approximately $9,000,000,000, and he still has appropriated and unexpended, which the people will have to pay, $12,000,000,000. This has completely unbalanced the Budget. He has not had the courage to place the taxes on the people to make these expenditures. Every foolish move he has made has prevented business from providing employment; has prevented the people from having work.

The taxes he has proposed will not raise any revenue whatever, but will drive the wealthy out of productive enterprise which provides work for the people into tax-exempt securities. This is not the way to provide employment for the people, but the way to drive them out of work.

If the people are to have better houses to live in, if they are to have more to eat, if they are to have better clothes to wear, and more comforts, it must come as a result of a policy which will provide private employment. Today, if we would stop the foolish Government expenditures, balance the Budget with taxes, and stop doing the foolish things which destroy our farmers and our working people, the improvements required upon industrial plants alone would run five times the foolish expenditures made by the Government to demoralize our people.

What Roosevelt terms reform is in most cases not reform but schemes to wreck business and keep people out of work.

I charge, because there is no other explanation for the operations of the Roosevelt administration, that the efforts of President Roosevelt have been directed deliberately toward those policies which would naturally destroy confidence, throw people out of work and on relief, establish communism and State ownership of all endeavor, but most of all, establish a dictatorship with Franklin D. Roosevelt as dictator.

Where, I ask, is there a place for a labor union in a dictatorship; where is the opportunity for the workingman to have a job; where is the opportunity for the workingman to improve his conditions? He and everyone else will be a slave, just as they are in Russia. Is it not time for the people in America to arouse themselves, throw off the yoke that binds them, demand their liberty, give the farmer an opportunity to operate his business at a profit, and instead of having fake measures for relief of farmers have those that will accomplish something and not destroy them. Now is the time for every good American to come to the aid of his country and take his place and bear his share of the responsibility of citizenship. Throw off the Roosevelt yoke and stand for the improvement and recovery of America.

RELIGIOUS STATUS OF AMERICAN CITIZENS RESIDENT IN MEXICO

Mr. HIGGINS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HIGGINS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, on July 16 a petition for an inquiry by the United States into the religious status of American citizens resident in Mexico was presented to the Honorable Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States, by a delegation representing 250 Members of the House of Representatives. The text of this petition reads as follows:

TEXT OF PETITION

At the present time it is reported that there are 14 States in the Republic of Mexico where no minister of religion, be he Christian or Jew, is permitted to exercise his sacred functions. Taking cognizance of this condition, the British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Sir John Simon, has promised the members of the House of Commons that he would interest the British Minister at Mexico City, as well as the British consular officials throughout the aforesaid 14 States of Mexico, to institute an inquiry as to the facilities for Divine worship available to British citizens resident in or visitng these communties.

In view of the fact that there are more American citizens of all denominations than there are British citizens, both resident in and visiting the 14 States where no minister of religion is permitted, the question naturally arises whether a similar inquiry might not be made in the Republic of Mexico through the American Embassy and the American consular officials. The undersigned Members of Congress, together with the full membership of the committee, believe that some simple and constructive measure ought to be taken in order to ascertain the facts on this situation, evidencing an affirmative interest in the religious rights of American citizens of all faiths and creeds.

MEMBERS OF DELEGATION WHO VISITED THE WHITE HOUSE

The members of the committee which presented this petition at the White House were: Representatives JOHN P. HIGGINS, of Massachusetts, chairman, and CLARE GERALD FENERTY, of Pennsylvania, co-chairman; WILLIAM M. CITRON, HERMAN P. KOPPLEMANN and JAMES A. SHANLEY, of Connecticut; JOHN J. BOYLAN, EMANUEL CELLER, JAMES M. MEAD, RICHARD J. TONRY, HAMILTON FISH, Jr., and THOMAS H. CULLEN, of New York; JOHN W. MCCORMACK, GEORGE HOLDEN TINKHAM, WILLIAM P. CONNERY, and ARTHUR D. HEALEY, of Massachusetts; PETER A. CAVICCHIA and EDWARD J. HART, of New Jersey; J. BURRWOOD DALY, of Pennsylvania; JOHN D. DINGELL and ALBERT J. ENGEL, of Michigan; RAYMOND S. MCKEOUGH, of Illinois; MARTIN L. SWEENEY, of Ohio; and RICHARD J. WELCH and JOHN M. COSTELLO, of California.

In presenting this petition, the committee also gave President Roosevelt a rather lengthy memorandum, prepared by Representatives JOHN P. HIGGINS, of Massachusetts, and CLARE GERALD FENERTY, of Pennsylvania, co-chairman of the voluntary House committee interested in this cause. The text of this memorandum reads as follows:

MEMORANDUM TO THE HONORABLE FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, WITH RESPECT TO THE PETITION OF THE MEMBERS OF THE VOLUNTARY CONGRESSIONAL COMMITTEE ON MEXICO WITH PARTICULAR REFERENCE TO THE RELIGIOUS RIGHTS OF AMERICAN CITIZENS

(By JOHN P. HIGGINS (D), of Massachusetts, and CLARE GERALD FENERTY (R), co-chairman, Pennsylvania)

The first point which our committee wishes to emphasize is that we come as champions of religious liberty in behalf of all groups and denominations in Mexico, especially wherever the religious or educational rights of our American citizens have been violated. In other words, our representations are not made in the name of one particular group but in the name of all those who believe in God and feel the conscientious obligation to worship the Supreme Being. The movement in Mexico has been admirably pointed out in a recent statement by Dr. Charles S. MacFarland, secretary general emeritus of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, when he says that the persecution is not anti-Christian or anti-Jewish but anti-God. It is a direct assault upon the fundamental rights of conscience.

In order to illustrate this point, the members of our committee direct attention to the fact that more than two-thirds of the 250 signatures upon our petition, a copy of which is attached, which calls for an inquiry as to the facilities available for religious worship by Americans in 14 States in Mexico, are those of Protestant and Jewish Congressmen. These gentlemen evidently agree with the editorial judgment of the organ of the Episcopal Church in this country, which recently declared that the anti-God movement undertaken by the Mexican Government was "a major scandal in world affairs." Numerous Members of Congress have studied the editorials that have appeared in the Christian Index of Georgia, the Christian Century, and the American Hebrew, as well as the formal statement of the National Council of Jews and Christians, and are convinced that the atheistic drive in Mexico is a matter of international concern, especially where it infringes upon the rights of American citizens who desire to worship God according to the dictates of their conscience.

Mr. President, although this committee is convinced that numerous, sincere, and salutary efforts have been made by the American Government in order to bring the Mexican Government to a full realization of the gravity of this problem, the members of the committee, nevertheless, feel obligated to voice their concern that absolutely nothing of an official public character has been put on record to show American concern for the traditional American principle of religious liberty; particularly where the rights of American citizens are involved. This concern, it may be added, is being felt with an increased depth of conviction by all classes and denominations in continental United States. As one of our members express the gist of our position to the Honorable Cordell Hull, American Secretary of State, it is the deeply rooted conviction of the members of this committee that there should be on record some overt statement or public statement which would clearly indicate in the eyes of our own people and to the expectant gaze of the civilized world that the American Government is entirely disassociated from the official persecution of religion in Mexico. It is the belief of our committee that this public statement can be couched in such friendly, courteous, and dignified language that no possible offense can be taken by any official of the Mexican Government. Far from endangering the good-neighbor policy so carefully developed by the United States Department of State, under your administration, Mr. President, this public championing of the principle of religious liberty would win the most cordial admiration both from the vast bulk of the Mexican people and from the populations of all the other Latin American nations.

Above all, Mr. President, the committee is unalterably opposed to any semblance of interference or intervention in Mexico. This is a question of the moral vindication of an ethical principle. The members of our committee desire that American intervention of whatever character should be stopped immediately. There is an impression in many quarters that there has been intervention of an undesirable character, in the sense that an attempt has been made to block the efforts of those interested in this campaign for human rights. It has been publicly charged and never denied that the administration gave orders that there would be no hearings either on the Borah resolution or on any other of the Mexican resolutions now apparently buried in committee in both the House and the Senate. These are indications that, as far as the public is concerned, the United States Government has scarcely manifested an attitude of neutrality, but has actively taken one side as against the other. That the best of intentions have motivated this policy we have no doubt, but with all possible deference and respect it is our duty to submit for your consideration the express conviction of a majority of your Congress that representations, unofficial and discreet in intent, are not enough. In order to illustrate that the desires of the committee are reasonable, fair, and temperate, I am taking the liberty to submit, Mr. President, drafts of proposed public statements that, in the judgment of the full membership of our committee, would effectively give public notice to the world and to Mexico that the American Government is vitally interested in the principle of religious liberty.

"The Government or the United States has not assumed to dictate the policy of other nations, or to make suggestions as to what the municipal laws should be or as to the manner in which they should be administered. Nevertheless, the mutual duties of nations require that each should use its power with due respect for the result which its exercise will produce on the rest of the world. It is in this respect that the religious conditions prevailing in Mexico whether they regard Protestant, Catholic, or Jew, are brought to the attention of the United States. It is an accepted practice under international law for one nation to use its good offices with a view to remove obstacles that may affect the cordiality that should exist between friendly governments and peoples.

"I am fully aware that millions of American communicants of all denominations view with increasing apprehension the existence of religious disabilities in our sister Republic of Mexico.

"I believe that the common consent of mankind and the better universal public opinion favor the utmost development of religion with the fullest opportunities for its teachings and practices, and I earnestly vouchsafe the hope that this idea will find even greater unanimity in the family of nations."

When diplomatic messages such as those outlined above are dispatched in a spirit of friendship to another sovereign nation, there is no reasonable ground for supposing or alleging that intervention or interference is contemplated. This has been made clear in recent days by the statesmanlike, diplomatic representations by the Honorable Cordell Hull, American Secretary of State, to the Ambassador of the Royal Italian Government. Was there a single voice raised in protest against this act of diplomatic procedure? What critic dares to raise the cry of "intervention" or "interference?"

To be sure it will be alleged in support of the procedure in this instance, that the American Secretary of State was justified primarily on the basis of the Kellogg Pact, but our committee believes that there are treaty provisions between the United States and Mexico which furnish a similar basis for remonstrance and protest. The terms of the Mexican agreement, guaranteeing full religious liberty as a condition of recognition, are quoted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD (Apr. 25, 1935, p. 6431).

On the other hand it is a matter of recorded history that this administration did actually inspire a demonstration of Senatorial protest against the persecution of Jews in Germany, on June 10, 1933, when eight United States Senators, led by the leader of the Democratic majority, the Honorable JOSEPH T. ROBINSON, and admittedly in the language of the Honorable J. HAMILTON LEWIS, administration whip, acting under instructions from the administration, rose in indignation in the Senate to denounce the religious intolerance in Hitler's Germany. No one on that occasion, Mr. President, suggested or spoke of "intervention" or "interference." In general, it may be said that this was regarded as an intelligent act of high-minded statesmanship. In the light of these precedents, Mr. President, is it not fair to inquire, with every mark of deference and respect, why the same administration should now discourage efforts to bring about a public protest?

Indeed the contrast in the administration attitude, both in regard to Ethiopia and Germany, is so marked that suspicion has been aroused that peradventure Your Excellency has been partially misled as to the wishes of the religious leaders who are interested in this problem. Foreseeing the possibility of such a misunderstanding, we, as chairmen of this committee have brought with us letters and statements from prominent prelates and religious authorities of many denominations.

From these declarations it must be clear that the leaders are not satisfied with a policy of official silence. In order not to burden Your Excellency with lengthy citations, we quote only one letter, couched in the most emphatic and striking language by an American cardinal, a prince of the church, known for his intellectual ability and love of the spirit of universal charity. His words on the subject are clear and unmistakable:

"If a great many more were to do what you have done, the Washington administration might, by this time, have done something for Christians and Jews in that unhappy land. Sooner or later right will prevail; but no thanks should be due to those in Washington who have shirked their duty, and will be remembered for their failure to act."

As for the argument that the Mexican Government wishes to save its honor in coming to an agreement on religious questions, it may be pointed out that the indulgence and the silence of the United States for 20 years have not borne such fruit as may be desired but that on the contrary the Mexican governmental attitude toward all religions has continued almost daily to go from bad to worse. Eight months ago, Mr. President, the brunt of the persecution in Mexico was centered against the Catholic church. Now it has become as violently anti-God as the governmental attitude in Soviet Russia.

Consequently, Mr. President, the members of this committee believe, basing their appeal on numerous precedents in the office of the American Secretary of State and submit as their deliberate judgment the opinion that official silence is neither an adequate remedy for the evils they deplore, nor an honorable position of this Government to maintain. In our judgment, the time has come to publish to the world our deep concern in this question of the rights of conscience. In our judgment, the irreducible minimum which can be expected, in default of some public pronouncement, is to give official instructions from the United States Department of State to the American embassy and the American consular offices in Mexico to the effect that the inquiry suggested in the congressional petition be undertaken without delay. This would make it clear in the words of the petition itself that the group representing the United States of America wishes to evidence "an affirmative interest in the religious rights of American citizens of all faiths and creeds."

The committee believes that this is an eminently fair, moderate, and reasonable request. It further believes that, if acted upon favorably, it will prove by its beneficial results to have been an intelligent act of high-minded statesmanship.

RESPONSE OF PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT

In response to this petition and this statement, prepared by the chairman of the committee, President Roosevelt, himself, wrote out the following memorandum for the Members of Congress and for the press. The memorandum reads:

The President stated that he is in entire sympathy with all people who make it clear that the American people and the Government believe in freedom of religious worship, not only in the United States but also in all other nations.

HAS CONGRESS ABDICATED?

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein a radio address made by myself on the 5th of July.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following address which I delivered at Washington, D. C., over the National Broadcasting Co. network on July 5:

The life of the United States as a nation began and has continued under the particular form of government which we now have. It is a form of government which obtains nowhere else on earth. Although it is less than 150 years old, it has endured longer without change in form than any other government in the world. Under it the people of the United States have grown to be the richest, the most powerful, the freest and the most secure of all people of the earth. If there are those who have been inclined to doubt this during the recent years of the depression the most unfortunate of them need only to compare their lot with that of the people of other countries during the same period.

Under our form of government the people themselves, who are the real rulers and from whom all governmental authority is derived, have always been able to meet and solve every problem and every crisis that has risen in our Nation's life. They will continue to do this, in my opinion, so long as they maintain the form of government which has enabled them to do it in the past, and they will solve our present problems if only they will not depart from that theory and that system of government which for 150 years has been distinctly and uniquely their own.

The form of our government is that prescribed by the Constitution, which is the fundamental law of the land and which was made and adopted by the people themselves. It is a grant of limited power from the people to the Federal Government. The Constitution of the United States proceeds upon the theory that all governmental authority is vested in the people and that the exercise of that authority shall be at all times in control of the people. In order to insure this the Constitution has provided that the power granted under it to the Federal Government shall be exercised through the agencies of three separate and distinct departments or branches, each having its own exclusive jurisdiction and function, and that the authority of one branch may not trespass upon or interfere with the function or authority of the others.

The first branch of this governmental agency is the legislative branch, which is composed of a Congress of elected representatives or agents of the people in whom is vested the sole duty and responsibility of making the law. The members of this branch of the Federal Government, both in the House and Senate, are responsible directly to the people who elect them and to no one else.

The second branch of Federal Government is the executive branch, consisting of a President, who is elected by the people, and of the several hundred executive officers ranging from Cabinet members down through the bureau chiefs, department heads, etc., who are appointed by and are responsible to the President. It is the duty of the executive department of the Government to administer the law which the Congress makes. The President is also authorized to recommend legislation for the consideration of Congress and is given the conditional power of the veto which, however, may be overridden by a two-thirds majority of the Congress. So that the full lawmaking authority of the Federal Government always remains in Congress.

The third branch of the Federal Government is the judicial branch, at the head of which is the Supreme Court of the United States. It is the duty of the Supreme Court to interpret the law and to see to it that both the law itself and the administration of it are within the limitations prescribed by the Constitution.

The necessity for a judicial or law-interpreting branch of the Government arises from the fact that the people of the United States in setting up the machinery of Federal Government gave to the Federal legislature only limited lawmaking power. They granted to Congress the right to make certain kinds of law and prohibited it from making certain other kinds. Within the limitations of the Constitution, however, the lawmaking jurisdiction of Congress is not only supreme but exclusive. This constitutional grant of authority from the people to the Federal Government, let me repeat, is limited by the terms of the Constitution. That instrument gives to the Federal Government the right to exercise only a part of the whole governmental power belonging to the people and provides that all power not expressedly granted by the Constitution to the Federal Government shall be vested in the States or in the people themselves.

The power vested in the President by the Constitution is likewise limited. Therefore, whatever may be the case in other governments, under our own system it is absolutely indispensible that there be a law-interpreting branch with authority, in any case directly affecting the constitutional rights of the people, to declare whether an act of the Congress or an action of the President was such an act or action as the people's constitution permits.

The Constitution of the United States is based upon the fundamental theory that ours is a Government of law and not of men. It, therefore, denies to officers of the Federal Government, who are simply agents of the people, any power whatever except that given them by law. Furthermore, it denies to an executive officer any power to make the law which he is charged with administering, and it denies to a legislative officer any power to administer the law which he makes. This is a part of the theory of checks and balances, which is the heart of the Constitution, and the strict aderence to which during the 150 years of our national existence has been responsible not only for the stability of the Government but for the retention of governmental authority in people.

Since the World War, and particularly since the beginning of the world-wide depression which followed the war, there has been a growing tendency on the part of executive officers of governments throughout the world to subordinate the legislative branches of those governments to the executive branch. In several European countries this form of executive usurpation has gone so far that parliamentary government has disappeared altogether and the chief executives of those countries at present not only administer the law but also make it.

The question is repeatedly asked whether the Government of the United States has been able to escape this modern tendency to subdue the power of the lawmaking branch of the Government and to concentrate all authority in the executive department. Since it is obvious that under our form of Government the Chief Executive cannot usurp legislative power unless the Congress itself surrenders that power to him, let us try to answer this question first by inquiring by what methods, if any, it is possible for Congress to do this.

There are three methods by which Congress may abdicate its lawmaking power. The first is by enacting only those laws which the President demands and by refusing to permit consideration of any others. The second is by allowing the President himself, or some of his appointees in the executive departments, to actually write the law and then to have the Congress go through the legal formality of enacting it. The third method is by granting to the President the power to make law himself upon certain subjects through the issuance of orders or proclamations having the force and effect of law. All of these methods of abdicating its power is forbidden to Congress by the Constitution. Therefore, if the Congress has done any of these things it is obvious that to the extent it has done them it has abdicated its lawmaking power to the President.

With a very few exceptions no major laws have been enacted during the present administration except those which have been specifically demanded in messages sent to the Congress by the President. Of the small number of important bills passed without the President's orders most have been promptly vetoed, and the administration majority in Congress is so overwhelming that the overriding of a veto in the Seventy-third and Seventy-fourth Congresses has been practically impossible. There are many important bills now lying in committees which have been introduced by individual Members in pursuance of their constitutional duty and responsibility as lawmakers. The enactment of some of these bills has been long demanded by millions of people of the United States, and in the case of at least one of such bills the legislatures of a majority of the States have formally petitioned Congress to enact it. Yet until the President says that he wants any or all of these laws enacted there is not the remotest possibility of their being considered even by a committee of Congress. In the Congress of the United States the majority is supreme, and when that majority numbers more than 3 to 1 and when it is dominated by the wishes of the Executive administration in power, the right of the minority for all practical purposes of lawmaking is done away with whenever the desires of the minority conflict with the personal views of the Chief Executive.

Thus through Executive domination of the legislative majority the Congress has progressed far along the road to abdication under the first method I have mentioned.

Again, with but a few exceptions, no bill of major importance enacted during the present administration has been written or drafted or even conceived by an individual Member of Congress or by any committee of Congress. Practically all have been prepared by executive officers of the Government, who are not responsible either to the Congress or to the people. When a bill thus prepared is ready for introduction it is sent by the executive department to the chairman of the committee of Congress which is to report it to the House, and the chairman's name is then printed on the bill as the author of it. Important legislation sent to committee in this manner has been reported to the House without any consideration worthy of that name, without changing a single line or word and under gag rules which have been forced upon the House by the majority party. Under these gag rules no amendment to the bill is permitted. All of this has been done at the demand of the President, whose leaders on the majority side see to it that his orders are carried out by their followers. In this manner the second method of abdication is being effected.

Executive usurpation of legislative power is carried further by the enactment of laws giving to the President authority to make law himself upon certain subjects without consulting Congress at all. Examples of this have been the Economy Act, the Tariff Act of 1933, the Taylor grazing bill, the Bankhead cotton bill, and many others, all of which give the President power to make law. In the 1933 Tariff Act, for example, the Congress surrendered to the President practically all of its effective tariff-making power by authorizing the President, in his own discretion, to raise or lower any existing tariff by 50 percent, merely by issuing an Executive order to that effect.

It must be obvious to all thoughtful people that if this process of abdication is carried to its ultimate and logical conclusion, it will be only a matter of time when there will be no more lawmaking power left in Congress, and that when that time comes there will be no reason for continuing to have a legislative branch of the Government at all. That point has already been reached in other countries, notably in Italy and in Germany, whose parliaments, having abdicated completely to the chief executives of those nations, have been dissolved altogether.

The question now naturally arises: Who is responsible for this situation which is undermining the very foundation of our system of government, and what can be done about it?

The responsibility for this gradual abdication of Congress lies with the people themselves. In their despair during the recent depressing years and in their desire to find a short cut to the solution of their economic problems, the people of this country have unconsciously allowed themselves to follow the example of the people in Europe and to try the experiment of government by men instead of government by law. They did this by electing to the Congress of the United States an overwhelming majority of men whose very campaign pledges should have disqualified them in the eyes of the people as Federal lawmakers under our system of government.

These men did not pledge themselves to make law. They did not pledge themselves even to carry out the declarations of their own party platform in regard to the kind of law that should be enacted. Instead they pledged themselves, as Members of the lawmaking body, to support the head of the executive department of the Government, and to support him 100 percent. I repeat that such a pledge disqualifies its maker for a seat in the lawmaking branch of the Government. A pledge of this kind may be a proper pledge for a Cabinet officer to make, or for any other officer in the executive branch of the Government who is appointed by the President and is responsible to him. But when a Member of the legislative branch makes that pledge he precludes himself in advance from functioning as a legislator, because by it he pledges himself to enact only such a law as the President may want.

As the responsibility for this situation lies with the people so also does the remedy. The Constitution, as I have said, vests all governmental power in the people. It is for the people to say whether they want a Congress of their own representatives who are pledged to perform their constitutional duty and responsibility as independent lawmakers, or whether they want a Congress composed of a majority which has pledged itself in advance not to do that. The representatives of the people who framed the Constitution knew, of course, that the people themselves would sometimes make mistakes. Wisely they provided in that document a speedy and convenient method for the people to correct their mistakes. That method is the constitutional provisions for frequent elections. If the people decide they have made a mistake in allowing their representatives in Congress during the past 3 years to depart from that adherence to our form of government which the Constitution requires they may correct that mistake when again the time comes for them to select those who are to represent them in the lawmaking body of their country.

RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENT WITH RUSSIA

Mr. MCCARRAN. Mr. President, in furtherance of an amendment which I have pending to the bill now before the Senate, and as showing the devastating influence and effect of the so-called "trade agreement" with Russia, I ask to insert in the RECORD a telegram received from the American Match Institute.

The Honorable PATRICK MCCARRAN,

Entire American match industry, employing 25,000 workers in 14 different States, heartily endorses your stand opposing recent trade pact our Government has made with Russia. Immense quantities of Russian Soviet strike-on-box safety matches now in Government warehouses will be dumped on American market as soon as this trade agreement goes into effect. We thoroughly agree with you that reciprocal tariff law is unconstitutional.

Manager American Match Institute.

BIDS FOR GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS SUBJECT TO CODES OF FAIR COMPETITION

Mr. WALSH. I ask consent to introduce for appropriate reference a joint resolution to authorize the acceptance of bids for Government contracts made subject to codes of fair competition. I also ask that certain correspondence from the General Accounting Office relating to the subject matter may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred, and the correspondence presented by the Senator from Massachusetts will be printed in the RECORD.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 163) to authorize the acceptance of bids for Government contracts made subject to codes of fair competition was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution to authorize the acceptance of bids for Government contracts made subject to codes of fair competition

Resolved, etc., That no bid submitted prior to the enactment of this joint resolution in response to the invitation of any executive department, independent establishment, or other agency or instrumentality of the United States, the District of Columbia, or any corporation all the stock of which is owned by the United States (all of the foregoing being hereinafter designated as "agencies of the United States"), if otherwise valid and acceptable, shall be rejected because made subject to the provisions of any code or codes of fair competition, or any related requirements (as provided in Executive Order No. 6646 of Mar. 14, 1934), if the bidder, with the assent of his surety, shall agree in writing that the contract, if entered into, shall, in lieu of such code provisions or other related requirements, be subject to all acts of Congress, enacted after the date of enactment of this joint resolution, requiring the observance of minimum wages, maximum hours, or limitations as to age of employees in the performance of contracts with agencies of the United States. In such cases the compensation provided for in the contract shall be reduced from that stated in the bid by the amount that the contracting officer, subject to the approval of the Comptroller General, shall find the cost of performing the contract is reduced solely by reason of the contractor not complying with the provisions of such code or codes or related requirements, and the compensation for the performance of the contract shall be increased from that fixed in the contract by the amount that the contracting officer, subject to the approval of the Comptroller General, shall find the cost of performing the contract has been increased solely by reason of compliance with such subsequent acts of Congress, if any, relating to the performance of contracts with agencies of the United States.

The correspondence referred to is as follows:

GENERAL ACCOUNTING OFFICE,
July 18, 1935.

SENATOR WALSH: Pursuant to your informal request of this afternoon I have examined the proposed resolution to be introduced by you and return it herewith with copies of the decisions rendered by the Comptroller General to the effect that bids submitted on the basis of code compliance and not accepted prior to May 27, 1935, date of the opinion and judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Schechter case, should be rejected with readvertisement on the basis of eliminating such requirement; that is, on the basis of securing bids without the inclusion therein of such additional amounts as the respective bidders might believe to be necessary in the performance of the contract to reimburse them for the added expenses of code compliance.

I have suggested a few minor amendments in the draft of the proposed resolution, the amendments being typed in black as substitutes for the language of the draft typed in blue, which has been indicated by parentheses. Also, I have proposed the elimination of the phrase "to be", as indicated.

O. R. MCGUIRE,
Counsel to the Comptroller General of the United States.

COMPTROLLER GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, July 18, 1935.

The Honorable the SECRETARY OF WAR:

SIR: There has been received your letter of July 13, 1935, as follows:

"Reference is made to your decisions of June 20, 1935, A62730, and July 1, 1935, A63153, A63252, and A63295, to the effect that where bids were submitted on the basis of certificates of compliance with code and as there are now no codes with which to comply, such bids should be rejected with readvertising.

"It is evident that these decisions were based on the assumption that bids submitted under certificates of code compliance include additional compensation on the basis of such code compliance.

"There is enclosed herewith abstract of bids of Rock Island Arsenal, proposal no. 35-330, together with copies of the bids submitted, which were opened May 15, 1935, covering the procurement of armor plate for combat vehicles. The award already has been made for the 19 sets of armor plate for medium tanks under item no. 1 of the circular proposal.

"The other items of this circular proposal cover armor plate for light tanks in various quantities. The requesting of bids under several items covering varying quantities was because at the time the proposal was issued the exact number of vehicles which might be procured with the funds appropriated could not be determined. The making of the award under any of the items covering armor plate for light tanks has been delayed to the present time pending a definite determination of the exact number of vehicles to be procured.

"The number of light tanks which it will be possible to procure has now been definitely determined as 144. The number of sets of armor plate for these vehicles is covered by items nos. 5 and 9 of the proposal. It has been decided that the needs of the Government will best be served by accepting the lowest bid submitted under item no. 9, that of the Diebold Safe & Lock Co. at 72⅞ cents per pound.

"The Diebold Safe & Lock Co. are now manufacturing, under Contract W-741-ORD-1564, 58 sets of armor plate for the same type of vehicle at a price of 82 cents per pound. The Ordnance Department has a resident inspector at the contractor's plant. Also representatives of both Rock Island Arsenal and the Ordnance Office have made various trips to that plant and are familiar with conditions there. Based on reports received from these representatives of the Ordnance Department, it is understood that the Diebold Co. is finding the fabrication of this armor plate much more difficult than was anticipated. It is believed that if the inclosed bids were rejected and new bids requested, the bid of the Diebold Safe & Lock Co. would be materially higher than their present bid. It should be noted that the next higher bid under item no. 9 is 31 percent higher than that of the Diebold Co.

"As the bid of the Diebold Safe & Lock Co. included a certificate as to code compliance which requirement cannot now be included in a contract, and in view of the conditions stated above, decision is requested as to whether it will be necessary to reject all bids enclosed herewith with readvertisement, or whether it will be proper to award the contract on the basis of the present lowest bid omitting from the contract all requirements as to code compliance."

Where bidding has been upon conditions that must be abandoned in contracting, and especially where such conditions may have influenced the bids either as to amount or as to those bidding, there has not been open competition as required by section 3709, Revised Statutes, and this defect is not overcome by the possibility that new bidding on a proper basis may bring higher prices. With respect to the condition resulting from the decision, dated May 27, 1935, of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Schechter case, holding unconstitutional so much of the National Industrial Recovery Act of June 16, 1933 (48 Stat. 195) et seq., as purported to authorize codes of fair competition and the suspension of the National Industrial Recovery Board of the requirements of Executive Order No. 6646 of March 14, 1934, see the decisions of this office of June 20 and July 1, 1935, mentioned by you.

Accordingly, you are advised with respect to uses of the appropriation proposed to be charged that all bids in the instant matter, not properly accepted, based upon compliance with a code of fair competition—which codes and requirement that Government contractors observe them do not now exist—should be rejected and the needs as to armor plate readvertised on the basis of specifications eliminating all reference to such codes.

The papers are returned herewith.

Respectfully,

J. R. McCARL,
Comptroller General of the United States.

COMPTROLLER GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, July 1, 1935.

ADMINISTRATOR OF VETERANS' AFFAIRS,
Veterans' Administration.

SIR: There has been received your letter of June 27, 1935, as follows:

"The Veterans' Administration is in receipt of Circular Letter No. 100 from the Director of Procurement, Procurement Division, Treasury Department, reading in part as follows:

"'Until such time as the proposed legislation may be acted upon by Congress the Director of Procurement recommends that in lieu of the code compliance requirements stipulated in paragraphs 1 to 4, inclusive, of Executive Order 6646, temporarily suspended by Administrative Order G. C., No. 89, of May 29, 1935, all invitations to bid for supplies, materials, or construction projects of any character include the following clause:

"'"Bids are requested on the basis that if subsequent legislation shall require observance of minimum wages and/or maximum hours of employment and/or limitation as to age of employees in the performance of Government contracts any contract entered into shall be subject to modification to accord with such statutory requirements to the extent authorized or required by law" and contracts based thereon to be entered into accordingly.

"'It is further suggested that awards may be made on pending proposals if the bidder will agree to the inclusion in the contract of the stipulation above quoted in lieu of the code-compliance requirements, and if the bidder does not agree new proposals should be issued which include the above stipulation.'

"In considering the recommendations and suggestions of the Director of Procurement the following questions arise, and it will be appreciate if you will answer them in order that bids may be properly acted upon:

"1. In the event the lowest bidder deletes from his bid the above-quoted provision or otherwise indicates when submitting his bid that he does not subscribe to the said provision may the bid be rejected as not being responsive to the invitation, and, if not, what disposition shall be made of the bid?

"2. In those instances where awards have not been made on pending proposals which do not include the code-compliance requirements and the lowest acceptable bidder refuses to subscribe to the condition recommended by the Director of Procurement, should all bids be rejected and new bids solicited which include the above-quoted provision, and, if not, what action may be taken on such proposals?

"3. In those instances where awards are pending and the bids submitted include the code-compliance requirements, what action should be taken in the event the lowest acceptable bidder refuses to subscribe to the condition recommended by the Director of Procurement in lieu of the code-compliance requirements?

"4. When making emergency or open-market purchases and it is not possible or practicable to get the vendor to subscribe to the condition recommended by the Director of Procurement, may such purchases be made without regard to the condition, inasmuch as transactions of this character do not cover an extended period of time but are negotiated and completed immediately?"

As stated in decision of June 20, 1935, A–62730, the decision dated May 27, 1935, of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Schechter case declared unconstitutional so much of the act of June 16, 1933 (48 Stat. 195 et seq.), as authorized codes of fair competition, with the result that even though bids may have been received containing certificates of compliance with applicable approved codes of fair competition there are now no such codes with which the contractor could comply, and it would be an unauthorized use of appropriations and an unjustified drain upon Public Treasury to award contracts submitted on the basis of compliance with a code when the contractor would not be required to so comply, but, nevertheless, would receive such additional compensation as might on the basis of code compliance in performing have been included in the bid.

After May 27, 1935, the Director of Procurement, Treasury Department, formulated the provision to be included in advertising for bids, as stated in the above-quoted letter of June 25, 1935, and it was stated by this office on June 24, 1935, A–63153, that:

"The provision employed by procurement reserves the right to modify the contract in the event subsequent legislation should require observance of minimum wages, maximum hours, etc., and, to such extent as there may be involved in adjustments additional drains on appropriations, there seems essential a statutory requirement as basis therefor else adjustments might create deficiencies in contravention of law and thus would be unauthorized notwithstanding any administrative reservation in contracting. Contracts obligating appropriations must be definite and certain.

"In view of the fact there was contemplated seeking legislation with respect to fixing maximum hours and minimum rates of wages for workers on Government projects and prohibiting the employment of children thereon and it was administratively desired to reserve, in entering into contracts prior to consideration of such proposal by the Congress, the right to make modification therein to bring them into conformity with such legislation, if enacted, there seemed to this office nothing to prohibit requesting bids and contracting in such manner that if the Congress should by legislation provide for fixing maximum hours and/or minimum rates of wages and/or limiting the age of employees on Government projects, and in such connection should specifically require or authorize modification of existing contracts to conform therewith, where the right had been so reserved in contracting, such contracts could be modified accordingly, and the Director of Procurement was informally so advised.

"It is believed the reservation provided for in circular letter no. 100, issued by the Director of Procurement and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, will permit modification of contracts wherein employed, with respect to the matters reserved, and to the extent authorized or required by subsequent legislation, and goes as far in the matter as is consistent with the laws relating to the obligation of appropriated moneys."

The reservation contemplates—in the event subsequent legislation shall require observance of minimum wages and/or maximum hours of employment and/or limitation as to age of employees, in the performance of Government contracts, and shall authorize modification of existing contracts wherein the right to so modify has been thus reserved—modification of such existing contracts so as to bring them into conformity with the terms of such legislation with respect to the elements reserved, with right in contractor to be reimbursed the actual additional costs made necessary thereby.

In view of the requirements of section 3709, Revised Statutes, there appears no authority of law for requiring bidders and prospective contractors of the United States to agree to such provision as a condition precedent to contracting with the United States. (See decision of Jan. 2, 1934, A–50815, 13 Comp. Gen. 181, to you, and Jan. 10, 1931, A–34106, 10 Comp. Gen. 294, to the Secretary of the Treasury.) The said provision when included in the advertised specifications may properly be viewed under section 3709, Revised Statutes, only, as a request to bidders on the part of the advertising and contracting agencies of the United States that bids be submitted upon the basis that in event there should be enacted legislation of the character mentioned prior to the completion of the contract to be awarded the contractor will agree to modification of the contract to conform with the terms of the requirements of such law.

Specifically, your questions nos. 1 and 2 are answered in the negative; such bids not being for rejection because the bidder declined to agree to future modification of contracts entered into because of subsequent changes in the law. As to your question no. 3—where bids were submitted on the basis of certificates of compliance with codes and as there are now no codes with which to comply—such bids should be rejected with readvertising. (See above referred to decision dated June 20, 1935, A–62730.) Your question no. 4 is answered in the affirmative.

Respectfully,

J. R. McCARL,
Comptroller General of the United States.

COMPTROLLER GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, July 1, 1935.

GENERAL PURCHASING OFFICER,
The Panama Canal, Washington, D. C.

SIR: There has been received your letter of June 25, 1935, in pertinent part, as follows:

"I am inclosing herewith a copy of Panama Canal Schedule No. 3066, bids under which were opened June 21, 1935, together with copy of amendment no. 1 to the schedule, dated June 10, adding to the 'special conditions' of the schedule a paragraph relative to compliance with employment requirements. This amendment was issued in view of pending legislation which would require certain provisions to be made in Government contracts relative to minimum wage and maximum hour standards.

"I am also inclosing herewith the original bid submitted by the Warren Foundry and Pipe Corporation under Schedule No. 3066. This company is the low bidder on items 4 and 5 of class 2, covering pipe fittings, and also on the flexible joints under class 3 of the schedule. However, it will be noted this bidder states the employment requirement provision covered by amendment

no. 1 would not be complied with. In view of this statement on the part of the bidder, it is respectfully requested that you advise whether or not this office is authorized to make any awards under the above-numbered schedule to the Warren Foundry and Pipe Corporation."

The question stated in the concluding sentence of the above-quoted extract of your letter of June 25, 1935, is answered in the affirmative for reasons stated in the enclosed copy of my decision of today to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs.

The papers enclosed with your letter are returned herewith.

Respectfully,

J. R. McCARL,
Comptroller General of the United States.

COMPTROLLER GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, June 20, 1935.

The Honorable the SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

SIR: There has been received your letter of June 8, 1935, as follows:

"The Bureau of Reclamation recently advertised for bids for tank-car gasoline, and among the bids received were two from the Texas Oil Co. and the Continental Oil Co., both of which concerns were previously declared to be violators of section 7-A of the National Industrial Recovery Act as embodied in section 7, article II of the petroleum code. In conformity with the provisions of the Executive order of the President dated March 14, 1934, and also in view of your decision regarding violation of codes by bidders, this Department has refused to consider or entertain any bids received from the above-named companies.

"In view of the recent Supreme Court decision regarding the National Industrial Recovery Act this Department desires to be advised whether we would be justified in continuing the rejection of bids received from companies which have been held to be in violation of codes, or whether award can now be made to these companies, provided their bids are low."

The petroleum code as initially issued was based on section 9 of the National Industrial Recovery Act of June 16, 1933 (48 Stat. 200), which was subsequently held to be unconstitutional in an opinion and judgment dated January 7, 1935, of the Supreme Court of the United States in Panama Refining Co. et al. v. Ryan et al. Thereafter the Congress in Public, No. 14, approved February 22, 1935, attempted to meet the defects in section 9 of the act of June 16, 1933, as pointed out in the Panama Refining Co. case. Whether it has done so remains to be seen in view of the opinion and judgment dated May 27, 1935, of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Schechter case. However, unless and until the act of February 22, 1935, is invalidated or repealed it is to be observed by the administrative and accounting officers of the United States.

However, the petroleum code of fair competition necessarily fell with section 9 of the act of June 16, 1933, and there is nothing whatever in the act of February 22, 1935, which could be interpreted as reviving such code or as authorizing another code of fair competition to enforce the terms of said act. Section 6 of the act of February 22, 1935, provides a fine of not to exceed $2,000 or imprisonment not to exceed 6 months, or both such fine and imprisonment upon conviction for knowingly violating any provision of said act, and section 10 thereof provides that:

"SEC. 10. (a) Upon application of the President, by the Attorney General, the United States district courts shall have jurisdiction to issue mandatory injunctions commanding any person to comply with the provisions of this act or any regulation issued thereunder.

"(b) Whenever it shall appear to the President that any person is engaged or about to engage in any acts or practices that constitute or will constitute a violation of any provision of this act or of any regulation thereunder, he may in his discretion, by the Attorney General, bring an action in the proper United States district court to enjoin such acts or practices, and upon a proper showing a permanent or temporary injunction or restraining order shall be granted without bond.

"(c) The United States district courts shall have exclusive jurisdiction of violations of this act or the regulations thereunder, and of all suits in equity and actions at law brought to enforce any liability or duty created by, or to enjoin any violation of, this act or the regulations thereunder. Any criminal proceeding may be brought in the district wherein any act or transaction constituting the violation occurred. Any suit or action to enforce any liability or duty created by this act or regulations thereunder, or to enjoin any violation of this act or any regulations thereunder, may be brought in any such district or in the district wherein the defendant is found or is an inhabitant or transacts business, and process in such cases may be served in any other district of which the defendant is an inhabitant or wherever the defendant may be found. Judgments and decrees so rendered shall be subject to review as provided in sections 128 and 240 of the Judicial Code, as amended (U. S. C., title 28, secs. 225 and 547)."

That is to say, the act of February 22, 1935, provides the punishment and establishes the judicial procedure to be followed in event of the violation of any provision thereof—and nowhere therein is there included any authority of law for officers of the United States to reject a low and otherwise proper bid submitted by any person, firm, or corporation subject to the act because it may be believed that they have violated some provision thereof. In this connection, your attention is invited to the fact that the requirements of Executive Order No. 6646 of March 14, 1934, relative to code compliance have been suspended. See administrative orders of May 29 and June 3, 1935, of the National Industrial Recovery Board.

Answering your question specifically, you are advised that the rejection of a low and otherwise proper bid submitted for delivery of gasoline, or other petroleum products to the United States upon the basis that such bidder had been administratively declared to be a violator of some provision of the act of February 22, 1935, is not authorized.

Respectfully,

J. R. McCARL,
Comptroller General of the United States.

COMPTROLLER GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, June 17, 1935.

CHAIRMAN UNITED STATES BOARD OF TAX APPEALS.

SIR: There has been received your letter of June 10, 1935, as follows:

"I have the honor to transmit herewith 11 open bids received under the call of May 14, 1935, for bids covering stenographic reporting service for the Board for the fiscal year 1936. The twelfth bid (unopened) was not received by the Board until 3:15 p. m. on May 28, 1935.

"According to the statements submitted by Smith & Hulse, one of the bidders, transmitted herewith, and my own calculations as set forth in the memorandum also enclosed, I am of opinion that the firm of Smith & Hulse may be considered the 'lowest bidder.' The responsibility of this bidder is unquestioned, and with these considerations I ask your decision as to whether the contract for the coming fiscal year may properly be awarded to the firm of Smith & Hulse."

While the unopened bid of Howard B. Smith bears Washington, D. C., postmark 7 p. m., May 27, 1935, and should have been delivered in time to be opened at 12 noon, May 28, 1935, instead of at 3:15 p. m. of that day, as indicated on the envelop, it appears unnecessary at this time to determine whether the bid should be opened for the reason that the advertised specifications contained a provision that—

"No bid will be considered unless it includes or is accompanied by a certificate duly executed by the bidder stating that the bidder is complying with and will continue to comply with each approved code of fair competition to which he is subject, and if engaged in any trade or industry for which there is no approved code of fair competition, then stating that as to such trade or industry he has become a party to and is complying with and will continue to comply with an agreement with the President under section 4 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act. (Executive order of Mar. 14, 1934.)"

When the bids—which were required to be accompanied by a certificate that the bidder was complying with, and would continue to comply with, the applicable approved codes of fair competition, or if no code, then with the President's reemployment agreement—were opened, the Supreme Court of the United States had decided on May 27, 1935, in the Schechter case that the provisions of the National Industrial Recovery Act of June 16, 1933 (48 Stat. 196 et seq.), relative to codes and code compliance were unconstitutional. And in such connection it is to be noted the National Industrial Recovery Board on May 29, 1935, as amended June 3, 1935, suspended the requirements of Executive Order No. 6646, of March 14, 1934, as referred to in the above-quoted extract from the advertised specifications of May 14, 1935.

It necessarily follows it would not be proper to now contract on bids required to be submitted on the basis of code compliance. Consequently, all of the bids should be rejected and there should be readvertising on the basis of specifications eliminating such requirement.

The papers are returned herewith.

Respectfully,

(Signed) J. R. McCARL,
Comptroller General of the United States.

PAYMENT OF PREVAILING WAGES ON WORK-RELIEF PROJECTS

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, earlier in the session for some 7 weeks the joint resolution in connection with the work-relief program appropriating $4,800,000,000 was held up because of an amendment demanding that the prevailing wage should be adopted in the several sections of the country.

I am happy now to announce to those who supported us in that great fight that by an Executive order, after nearly 3 months of study, it has been concluded that the amendment for the prevailing wage should become the rule under the new works appropriation.

For that reason I send to the desk and ask to have inserted in the RECORD an excerpt from the press of the country showing that the prevailing wage now obtains.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Herald]

UNION WAGES TO BE PAID ON WORKS RELIEF—LOWER SCALES ONLY TO APPLY ON PROJECTS UNDER $25,000; NEWS OF RATE PLEASES LABOR

Prevailing rates of wages will be paid on all work-relief projects costing more than $25,000, the administration informed union leaders yesterday.

Lower scales ranging from $19 to $94 per month, which were announced by President Roosevelt some time ago, will apply only to the small projects handled by Works Progress Administrator Hopkins.

UNIONS PLEASED

Union leaders were elated by this development, as it dispelled their fears that low relief wages would shatter the standard set by organized labor.

The pay on large projects will be based on union scales prevailing April 1, 1935. The old P. W. A. paid wages prevailing April 1, 1933, but it was discovered such wages were often higher than current union scales, due to pay cuts since 1933.

The administration's decision to pay prevailing wages on large projects resulted from the fact that most of these projects will be financed by loans and grants to States and cities. The law of most States requires payment of prevailing wages for public works.

Allotments to Government bureaus for public buildings also will be included in the prevailing-wage category.

EIGHT-HOUR DAY

An 8-hour day and a maximum 140-hour month was established by Mr. Hopkins today for persons employed on P. W. A. projects. These hours may be exceeded only in case of an emergency or when the limitations are "not feasible or practicable."

Deductions will be made from earnings for voluntary absence and illness. Pay will not be continued when work on a project is postponed or completed or when persons on relief are dismissed permanently.

The President yesterday approved an allotment of $97,500,000 to the Civilian Conservation Corps to build up its enrollment and to purchase supplies.

CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS' T. V. A. DECISION

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD an article by the United Press, published in the Washington Post of this date, on the subject matter of the decision on the T. V. A. by the Circuit Court of Appeals at New Orleans.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post of July 18, 1935]

T. V. A. UPHELD BY COURT; UTILITIES SYSTEM SPENT $700,000 ON LOBBYING—ALABAMA CASE REVERSED; CIRCUIT BENCH BACKING SALE OF POWER—FIGHT TO BE CARRIED TO SUPREME BENCH—RULING GIVES CONGRESS RIGHT TO COMPETE WITH PRIVATE INDUSTRY

NEW ORLEANS, LA., July 17.—The new deal scored a victory in the Fifth United States Circuit Court of Appeals today when the tribunal upheld the constitutionality of the Tennessee Valley Authority's "yardstick" electric program.

The decision, reversing an anti-T. V. A. ruling by Federal Judge W. I. Grubb, of Birmingham, swept aside all arguments that the Federal Government may not go into the business of selling surplus electricity.

All three appellate judges concurred in the opinion. They are, Judges Nathan P. Bryan, Rufus E. Foster, and Samuel E. Sibley. Attorneys for both sides had announced they would carry the case to the highest tribunal if the decision here went against them.

HOLDS UNITED STATES MAY COMPETE

"It is within the province of Congress to adopt any reasonable means, whether for lease or sale, for disposing of the surplus hydroelectric power at Wilson Dam", the three-judge circuit court held.

"The use of transmission lines to facilitate sales cannot fairly be said by the courts to be unreasonable or inappropriate", the ruling continued.

"Of course, it is true that the Government of the United States cannot engage at will in private business, but it by no means follows that it cannot sell property which it owns, even though in doing so it may enter into competition with other public or private owners of property.

"We live under a dual government of divided powers—Federal and State—not under separate governments of conflicting powers", the court said in awarding the new deal a singular victory and in answering the challenge that Congress had no authority to establish such a vast operation in competition with private business within State domain.

"The power over navigable waters granted to the Federal Government is not in conflict with but is necessarily superior to the dominion over such waters which the States reserved for themselves.

REHEARING IS ORDERED

"It leads nowhere to say that the Federal Government, in exercising its constitutional powers, acts within 'State domain' since at the same time it is acting within its own domain as well."

Judge Grubb had held that in creating T. V. A., first of the alphabetical agencies sponsored by President Roosevelt's new deal, Congress had exceeded its constitutional authority. The court reversed and remanded the Alabama jurist's decision and now the case returns to his court for rehearing.

The test case originated from an injunction sought by stockholders of Alabama Power Co., protesting sale or lease of Alabama Power Co. transmission lines to T. V. A. The T. V. A. Act of May 18, 1933, authorized the Government to take over the wartime "white elephant" of Wilson Dam and the nitrate plants at Muscle Shoals, Ala., and build new dams to improve navigation, flood control, and general work for the betterment of the Tennessee Valley.

POSSIBLE WAR USE CITED

Also, and foremost in public interest, the T. V. A. was authorized to sell to municipalities in the area surplus hydroelectric power available at the dams it operated on the Tennessee River. This current would be distributed over municipally owned systems to citizens at the low "yardstick" rates, which average about half those charged by private utilities in the region.

The appellate court said: "The right was reserved by the Government, in case of war, to take possession of the property for the purpose of manufacturing explosives or other war purposes.

"The fact that purposes other than navigation (and national defense) will also be served, could not invalidate the exercise of the authority conferred (by Congress), even if those other purposes would not alone have justified an exercise of the congressional power.

"It does not appear that T. V. A. is doing or proposes to do anything more than is authorized by the act. This being so, its motives are immaterial.

"The section of the act which provides that the President shall make recommendations to Congress as to the future policy of developing the Tennessee Valley is unobjectionable, as in any event the President can make any such recommendations to Congress as he thinks proper.

"The act is not subject to the criticism that Congress has abandoned all purposes of navigation and national defense, since navigation is now being improved.

SIBLEY GOES FURTHER

"The act provides for the location of Norris Dam, but whether specifically enough as to type is, as we think, immaterial; for Wilson Dam alone, without any assistance from Norris, Wheeler, or Pickwick Dams, has a surplus after serving the transmission lines which it agreed to purchase from the Alabama Power Co.

"Besides, the Alabama Power Co. has no standing to object even though these additional dams have not been properly authorized by Congress. It is not a riparian owner, or the owner of a dam site which the Government is assuming to take; nor has it any special interests as would entitle it to object to proposed improvement in aid of the national defense or of navigation."

Judge Sibley, concurring in the opinion, also added:

"The manner of the disposal of public property and the extent to which it may be allowed to affect private business are within the discretion of Congress. An exercise of legislative discretion is reviewable at the ballot box rather than in the courts."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, in connection with the article which the Senator from Arkansas just asked to have printed in the RECORD I ask unanimous consent that the entire decision of the court of appeals in the case mentioned be printed in the RECORD as it appears in the New York Times of today.

There being no objection, the decision was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, July 18, 1935]

TEXT OF DECISION OF THE FEDERAL CIRCUIT COURT ON TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY ACT

Bryan, circuit judge:

By contract dated January 4, 1934, the Alabama Power Co., a corporation engaged in the manufacture, transmission, and distribution of electricity, agreed to sell such of its transmission lines as extend from Wilson Dam at the Muscle Shoals plant in Alabama into seven Alabama counties to the Tennessee Valley Authority (T. V. A.), a corporate agency of the United States, created by the act of Congress of May 18, 1933 (48 Stat. 58; 16 U. S. C. A., 831, et seq.). The T. V. A. agreed to pay the purchase price of $1,150,000 upon delivery. The Alabama Power Co. further agreed that it would offer its distribution systems within the territory above named for sale to the respective municipalities in which such systems are located at prices which it was willing to accept; and that it would cooperate with the Electric Home and Farm Authority (E. H. F. A.), a Government corporate agency created to finance sales of electrical appliances, in the sale of such appliances.

The T. V. A. after waiting 3 months for the negotiation and consummation of sales of the urban distribution systems, was to have the right to furnish electric power to any and all such systems regardless of whether the Alabama Power Co. had sold them to the municipalities.

On May 21, 1934, the Alabama Power Co. entered into an agreement with E. H. F. A. to act as the latter's agent in the collection of installments due on the purchase price of electrical appliances sold by retailers to individual customers. On August 9, 1934, the Alabama Power Co., not having sold any of its distribution systems to the municipalities, granted to T. V. A. an option to purchase them; but on January 25, 1935, after this suit was filed T. V. A. gave notice that it had elected not to exercise that option.

MINORITY BROUGHT SUIT

On September 13, 1934, this suit to enjoin performance of the above-mentioned contracts was brought by a minority of the preferred-stock holders of the Alabama Power Co. after they had formally but unsuccessfully demanded that the company itself institute suit to rescind those contracts.

The decree of the district court, entered after final hearing, adjudged the contracts of January 4 and May 21 to be in furtherance of illegal proprietary operations by T. V. A. and ordered them annulled. It enjoined 17 municipal defendants, which were under contract to receive electric power from T. V. A. for use in the area served by the Alabama Power Co., from accepting or expending Federal funds for the construction of city electric-light plants, holding that these contracts were entered into in aid of T. V. A.'s illegal proprietary operations; and further enjoined them and the remaining municipal defendant, the city of Athens, which owns its distribution system, from purchasing electric power from T. V. A. on the ground that T. V. A. was engaged in illegal competition with the Alabama Power Co.

The T. V. A., E. H. F. A., and city of Florence appeal from the decree. The plaintiffs below have taken a cross-appeal, contending that the decree should have included a declaratory judgment in order to prevent T. V. A. from attempting to renew the option contract of August 9, which, it is said, was not exercised because of the pendency of this suit, or from engaging in divers other illegal operations not specifically enjoined.

The district judge made the following, among other, findings of fact: The United States acquired the Muscle Shoals property on the Tennessee River and built thereon Wilson Dam, an auxiliary steam plant, and two nitrate plants for war purposes. The existence of these facilities for the manufacture of war materials constitutes a valuable national asset. Wilson Dam, unaided by other power development, with its eight hydroelectric generators installed by the War Department, is capable of producing 50,000 kilowatts continuously, except during low stages of water; and the steam plant has a continuous capacity of 60,000 kilowatts. In 1934 68 percent of the power generated at Wilson Dam was used for governmental purposes.

SOMETHING OF FUTURE PLANS

Other dams under construction, which, like Wilson, are of the high-dam type, are, upstream, the Norris and the Wheeler, and, downstream, the Pickwick. The release of waters from Norris Dam will increase the continuous capacity of Wilson Dam by 40,000 kilowatts, and Norris Dam itself, if generators are installed, is capable of producing 73,000 kilowatts, if the Wheeler and the Pickwick Dams are used only as reservoirs.

According to present plans, the total continuous capacity of Wilson and Norris Dams in combination, without the aid of the steam plant, will be 202,000 kilowatts. The construction of Wilson Dam also provides a depth of 9 feet of slack water over the Muscle Shoals rapids, thereby eliminating a serious obstruction to navigation. Navigation will be further improved by the completion of Wheeler and Pickwick Dams. Storage of water by means of reservoirs is essential to adequate flood control on the Tennessee River.

Wilson Dam was completed in 1925 at a cost of $50,000,000. It probably is not capable of producing more water power than would be needed for the national defense in time of war, but in time of peace the power it makes available is so much in excess of the Government's needs for it for national defense and for navigation that, without the installation of any other dam, there is a surplus, even after supplying the transmission lines which T. V. A. agreed to purchase from the Alabama Power Co. There has been no sale or contract for sale of the remaining surplus.

The sale of electric energy generated at Muscle Shoals in excess of that required for operating the locks and servicing Government properties can be made to produce profits which could be applied toward the reimbursement of the cost of Wilson Dam, or expended in the construction of new dams.

COMPETITION AN ADMITTED AIM

It is not the purpose of T. V. A. to limit the production of electric power to that needed by the Government in manufacturing war materials and providing for navigation, but its declared policy is to utilize to the fullest extent possible all the electric energy which the Wilson and other dams are capable of producing, by supplying first governmental needs, and then by selling the surplus to users of electricity, in competition with public-utility corporations engaged in the manufacture, transmission, and distribution of electricity.

In disposing of surplus power T. V. A. intends to obtain revenue, but at the same time to undersell its private competitors in order to establish a "power yardstick" and to demonstrate the advantages of public over private ownership of electric-light plants.

Upon these findings of fact, which may safely be assumed to be correct since none of them is challenged, the district judge concluded, as a matter of law, that the Congress has no constitutional power to confer upon T. V. A., or any Federal agency, the right to enter into such a contract as that of January 4, and that the contract of January 4, since it was void as to T. V. A., was void as to the Alabama Power Co. The district judge, having reached this conclusion, consistently held that the dependent contract of May 21 was also void.

The plaintiff stockholders may be dismissed from further consideration, inasmuch as they are entitled to assert only the rights of the Alabama Power Co. and so we need to consider only the effect of the principal contract of January 4 upon the rights of the contracting parties.

The district judge, having held that T. V. A. was assuming to exercise authority which no act of Congress could constitutionally confer upon it, did not pass upon the contention made on behalf of the Alabama Power Co. that the T. V. A. Act of 1933 was invalid on the ground that it purports to delegate legislative authority. It was the view of the district judge that T. V. A., while it had the implied right to dispose of any surplus electric power, unintentionally created in the exercise of a bona fide effort to make such power only as was needed for the manufacture of war materials and for serving the necessities of navigation, had and could have no constitutional authority intentionally to create and sell any additional surplus.

He, therefore, enjoined further performance of the contract of January 4, not for any inherent infirmity, such as fraud, duress, or inadequate consideration, but solely because he was convinced that the program of T. V. A. for the manufacture and disposal of surplus electric power bore no substantial relation to any lawful governmental function.

It is the contention of T. V. A. that as an agency of the United States it has the constitutional right and statutory authority to dispose of all the electric power, in excess of such of it as may be needed from time to time for the production of war materials and for purposes of navigation, that the Wilson Dam operated to its full capacity can be made to produce.

Wilson Dam is the property of the United States. It was constructed by authority of 124 of the National Defense Act of 1916 (38 Stat. 215) for the purposes of supplying water power for the production of munitions of war and improving navigation on the Tennessee River. The right to erect and maintain it, in the exercise by Congress of the war and commerce powers conferred upon it by the Constitution, is so clear that it is conceded.

The Government by virtue of its lawful ownership of Wilson Dam owns also the water power inevitably created by the construction of that dam (Kaukauna Co. v. Green Bay & Co., 142 U. S. 254; Green Bay & Co. v. Patten Paper Co., 172 U. S. 58; United States v. Chandler-Dunbar Co., 228 U. S. 53).

AS TO RIGHT TO SELL POWER

Congress in the exercise of its power, under article IV, section 3, clause 2, of the Constitution, to dispose of property belonging to the United States, may dispose of water power created at Wilson Dam as freely as it may of any other Government property. It never heretofore has been held that the right of disposal exists only as to such part as is accidentally produced in excess of the amount strictly necessary for purposes of national defense or of navigation; but always that right has been supposed to extend to all the excess or surplus.

Water power is property sui generis; unlike most other forms of property it cannot be put away and kept for future use or sale, but it must be either converted into electricity and used up as it is released from storage or allowed to go to waste. If the water stored at Wilson Dam is permitted to pass through the penstocks, in the language of counsel for T. V. A., "there is gold in it", but if allowed to flow unhindered over the dam, "it is forever gone."

As a practical matter there would be no market for the incidental or accidental surplus created in the honest effort to produce only enough electricity to supply strictly governmental requirements; for no user, public or private, of electricity would become a customer unless assurance could be given of a firm and dependable supply.

That the surplus or any of it need not be allowed to go to waste, but that it and all of it may rightfully be disposed of and the proceeds applied toward reimbursement of the cost of a publicly owned dam is well settled (Kau-Kauna Co. v. Green Bay Co., supra; United States v. Chandler-Dunbar Co., supra; Arizona v. California, 283 U. S. 423). In the last cited case at page 455, it is said: "As the river is navigable and the means which the act provides are not unrelated to the control of navigation * * * the erection and maintaining of such dam and reservoir are clearly within the powers conferred upon Congress."

And so here, in our opinion, it cannot successfully be maintained that there is no reasonable or substantial relation between the production and disposal of the surplus hydroelectric power available at Wilson Dam and the exercise of the war and commerce powers conferred upon Congress.

HOLDS CONGRESS HAS AUTHORITY

It is within the province of Congress to adopt any reasonable means, whether of lease or sale, for disposing of the surplus. The use of transmission lines to facilitate sales cannot fairly be said by the courts to be unreasonable or inappropriate. Of course, it is true that the Government of the United States cannot engage at will in private business, but it by no means follows that it cannot sell property which it owns, even though in doing so it may enter into competition with other public or private owners of property.

It is not doubted that each of the several States holds in perpetual trust dominion over the navigable waterways within its borders, but it is equally true that the rights of the States in navigable waters are subject to the supreme war and commerce powers of the General Government.

We live under a dual government of divided powers, not under two separate governments of conflicting powers. The power over navigable waters granted to the Federal Government is not in conflict with but is necessarily superior to the dominion over such waters which the States reserved to themselves (Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1).

It leads nowhere to say that the Federal Government in exercising its constitutional powers acts within "State domain", since at the same time it is acting within its own domain as well. We conclude that the decree below cannot be sustained on the theory of a lack of constitutional power.

WHAT THE ACT PROVIDES

The inquiry remains whether the necessary statutory power has been conferred on the T. V. A. The Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933 was passed for the purpose, among others, "of maintaining and operating properties now owned by the United States in the vicinity of Muscle Shoals, Ala., in the interest of the national defense, * * * to improve navigation in the Tennessee River, and to control destructive flood waters in the Tennessee River and Mississippi River Basins."

The act purports in separate sections to confer on T. V. A. the power to construct dams, reservoirs, and transmission lines; to furnish nitrogen products for military purposes; to allot to the War Department the water power necessary to operate locks, lifts, or other facilities in aid of navigation; and to produce, distribute, and sell electric power "as herein particularly specified."

The "particular specifications" are to sell the surplus power not used in the operation of locks and other works to States, counties, municipalities, partnerships, or individuals. The act further provides for the construction of Norris Dam, and that the President may from time to time recommend to Congress such legislation as he deems proper for flood control, navigation purposes, generation of electric power consistent with flood control and navigation, the proper use of marginal lands, the proper method of reforestation in the drainage basin, and the economic and social well-being of the people living in the Tennessee River Basin.

RIGHTS RESERVED TO GOVERNMENT

The right was reserved by the Government, in case of war or national emergency declared by Congress, to take possession of all or any part of the property described or referred to in the act "for the purpose of manufacturing explosives or for other war purposes." The sections of the act are declared to be separable, to the end that the unconstitutionality of any one section may not affect the validity of any other.

The act is unobjectionable from a constitutional standpoint insofar as it undertakes to confer on T. V. A. the power to take charge of and operate Wilson Dam and to distribute and sell surplus electricity to municipalities as well as to utility companies. "And the fact that purposes other than navigation (and national defense) also will be served could not invalidate the exercise of the authority conferred, even if those other purposes would not alone have justified an exercise of congressional power." Arizona v. California, supra. It does not appear that the T. V. A. in respect of its operations at Wilson Dam is doing or proposes to do anything more than is authorized by the act.

MOTIVES CALLED IMMATERIAL

This being so, its motives are immaterial. The section of the act which provides that the President shall make recommendations to Congress as to the future policy of developing the Tennessee Valley is unobjectionable, as in any event the President may make such recommendations to Congress as he thinks proper. The act is not subject to the criticism that Congress has abandoned all purposes of navigation and national defense, since navigation is now being improved, and in the event of war the right is reserved to use the Muscle Shoals property exclusively for national defense.

The Rivers and Harbors Act of 1930 (46 Stat. 927) authorized a project for the permanent improvement of the main stream of the Tennessee River to a navigable depth of 9 feet in accordance with the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers in House Document No. 328 of the Seventy-first Congress, second session. Because there was no recommendation in that House document for high-type dams, or for their location, it is contended that the Tennessee Valley Authority Act undertakes to delegate legislative power with reference to the location and type of the Norris, Wheeler, and Pickwick Dams.

As we have just seen, the act itself provides for the location of Norris Dam, but whether specifically enough as to type is, as we think, immaterial, for Wilson Dam alone, without any assistance from Norris, Wheeler, or Pickwick Dams, has a surplus, after serving the transmission lines which it agreed to purchase from the Alabama Power Co. Besides, the Alabama Power Co. has no standing to object, even though these additional dams have not been properly authorized by Congress (Frothingham v. Mellon, 262 U. S. 477). It is not a riparian owner or the owner of a dam site which the Government is assuming to take, nor has it any such special interest as would entitle it to object to proposed improvements in aid of the national defense or of navigation (United States v. Chandler-Dunbar Co., supra, at p. 73).

On the whole case our conclusion is that the decree of the district judge was erroneous. We, therefore, have no occasion to consider whether the Alabama Power Co., if that decree had been affirmed, would have been entitled to a declaratory judgment.

Appellees take nothing by their cross-appeal. On the direct appeal the decree is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

CONCURRENCE BY SIBLEY

Sibley, circuit judge, concurring:

The district judge also found that the T. V. A. Board had very far-reaching plans for social experimentation which he thought beyond the constitutional limits of the Federal power. This case is not to be decided by the purposes and plans of the Board, but by the validity of what is about to be done under the attacked contracts.

The contracts deal only with surplus power arising at the Wilson Dam, which may, as we hold, be disposed of by Congress. The manner of the disposal of public property and the extent to which it may be allowed to affect private business are within the discretion of Congress. An exercise of legislative discretion is reviewable at the ballot box rather than in the courts.

DECISION HOLDING PROCESSING TAXES UNCONSTITUTIONAL

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the text of the decision of United States District Judge William H. Kirkpatrick, in Philadelphia, declaring the A. A. A. processing taxes unconstitutional, as published in today's Philadelphia Record.

There being no objection, the decision was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Philadelphia Record of July 18, 1935]

TEXT OF JUDGE KIRKPATRICK'S DECISION DECLARING PROCESSING TAXES ILLEGAL

This suit in equity is to restrain the collector of internal revenue from proceeding to collect a tax. The suit has to do with the tax levied by section 9 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act (7 U. S. C., sec. 609), as applied to the processing of hogs.

The Agricultural Adjustment Act is a comprehensive scheme of legislation, the primary purpose of which, as declared, is in substance to restore purchasing power of agricultural commodities to its pre-war level. The act proposes to attain this result chiefly by the payment to farmers of rental or benefit payments in consideration of their agreements to reduce production (sec. 3)—a program which has been largely put into effect.

The act also provides for "expansion of markets and removal of surplus agricultural products" (sec. 12 (b)), and, under this authorization, the Secretary of Agriculture has purchased such commodities in the open market and has bought and destroyed surplus farm stock. The money needed by the Secretary to do these things is to be raised by an excise tax upon the processing of certain agricultural commodities selected by him from a list set forth in the act (sec. 11). The act appropriates the proceeds of the tax to be available to the Secretary of Agriculture for carrying out its main objects.

STANDING OF PLAINTIFF

This plaintiff has no standing to challenge the constitutionality of those portions of the act which provide for the reduction program, or which delegate powers in connection therewith to the Secretary of Agriculture, or which appropriate the proceeds of the tax to that purpose. As a member of a limited class upon which the tax falls, however, it may call in question the constitutionality of the taxing sections of the statute.

The plaintiff attacks the constitutionality of the tax upon four distinct grounds, one of which, I think, is well taken. I have come to the conclusion that the sections of the act under which the processing tax is levied contains an invalid and unconstitutional delegation of power to the Secretary of Agriculture, thus rendering the tax void.

The principle which sustained the delegation of legislative or quasi-legislative power in all of the cases in which it was upheld was that the Congress itself had first legislated to the fullest extent reasonably practicable in view of the ends to be obtained. In other words, if delegation of legislative power is to be valid, the lawmaking body must use the power so far as it can before passing on the residue to its delegate.

FISCAL LEGISLATIVE POWER

Recognizing the propriety of fiscal legislation which could be adjusted to changing conditions and the necessity for some measure of delegation of power if the flexible provisions of the law were to have any real value, the Court, in Hampton & Co. v. United States, supra, said: "The same principle that permits Congress to exercise its rate-making power in interstate commerce, by declaring the rule which shall prevail in the legislative fixing of rates, and enables it to remit to a rate-making body created in accordance with its provisions the fixing of such rates, justifies a similar provision for the fixing of customs duties on imported merchandise.

"If Congress shall lay down by legislative act an intelligible principle to which the person or body authorized to fix such rates is directed to conform, such legislative action is not a forbidden delegation of legislative power."

In line with what has just been said, the restriction of the last clause of the quotation is worthy of note—"is directed to conform." It would seem that in cases of delegation of the taxing power the Court had in mind, not only a plenary exercise of that power by the Congress but also a close restriction, if not a total denial, of administrative "discretion" as to so much of it as could be properly delegated.

DELEGATION OF POWER INVALID

Examined in the light of these principles, the delegation of power contained in the processing-tax feature of the Agricultural Adjustment Act is clearly invalid. It is apparent that the Secretary of Agriculture and not the Congress exercises the taxing power, and in so doing there is committed to him a discretion as to the rate of the tax as well as to its incidence which is to all practical intents unlimited.

The act must be carefully read to realize that this is the case, because it is loaded with provisions which appear to be an exercise of the power to legislate and to set up a rule to be followed by the executive. It does contain a declaration of policy and it does contain a rule which purports to restrict the Secretary of Agriculture in carrying out the policy.

The statement of policy is quite as explicit as that declared in the flexible tariff act sustained in Hampton & Co. v. United States, supra, which was to equalize the differences in costs of production of dutiable articles in the United States and in the principal competing country. I should say that it was sufficiently definite to escape the criticism which condemned the declaration of policy of the National Recovery Act in the Schechter case. To raise the prices of agricultural commodities to an ascertainable figure is a simple and definite object.

UP TO THE SECRETARY

But did the Congress really exercise its function and impose this tax? The tax does not go into effect until action by the Secretary of Agriculture. A list of taxable articles ("basic agricultural commodities") is given in section 11. The Secretary of Agriculture may omit any article from the list or he may not act at all, in which case no tax upon anything will be imposed—a provision which in itself is no more objectionable than that relating to the increase of duties in the flexible tariff act. But in this respect (unlike the flexible tariff) his judgment need not be based upon nor controlled by his ascertainment of any facts or by the existence of any conditions predetermined by Congress as requisite to call the tax into being.

The Agricultural Adjustment Act says "When the Secretary of Agriculture determines that rental or benefit payments are to be made with respect to any basic agricultural commodity, he shall proclaim such determination, and a processing tax shall be in effect with respect to such commodity. * * *"

As indicative of the general intent of the act to delegate not only details but the essential taxing power itself it may be noted that section 15 provides that if at any time the Secretary of Agriculture finds that any article of commerce is competing with any of the basic agricultural commodities so that consumer demand is shifting away from such commodities, he may omit the processing tax upon such commodity or he may impose by proclamation a compensating tax upon such competing commodities. He determines what the competing commodity is and what the rate of tax shall be.

RULE OF DELEGATED POWER

Turning now to the rule or formula which purports to guide the exercise of the delegated power, we find that, as it is stated at the beginning of section 9 (b), it is quite simple. The tax is to be arrived at by subtracting the current average farm price for any commodity from the fair exchange value of the commodity (a term clearly enough defined later on in the act). The real trouble, however, is that the formula is obviously not intended and cannot, because of other provisions of the act, be a control upon the exercise of the delegated power.

This provision (fixing the tax rate) gives the Secretary an unfettered power to fix the rate at whatever figure he deems advisable to avoid a threatened accumulation of surplus. A finding is contemplated, but it is not necessarily of existing facts. It is that a certain result will occur—a prognostication of what is likely to happen.

It is argued that his discretion upon this point is controlled by the policy of the act, but obviously there must be more than this. Even the statement of a definite policy and a rule will not save a delegation if the statute expressly authorizes the official to follow it or not, as his judgment may dictate, even though he is to act on expert advice. Granted that, in practice, the exercise of this discretion would ordinarily mean the reduction of a rate rather than an increase, the act does not so specify, and under this provision an increase of the rate of tax beyond the point set by the formula would be fully authorized.

DOES NOT OPERATE AS CONTROL

In addition to the foregoing the defendant himself argues in effect that the formula is not intended to operate and does not operate as a control except as to the initial ascertainment of the rate. He points out that the declared policy is "to establish and maintain such balance", etc., and contends that, though rising prices for a commodity may automatically reduce the rate of the tax as ascertained by the formula, the Secretary may, if he should be of the opinion that a reduction would result in the balance not being maintained, disregard the formula and hold the rate at a point in excess of its upward limit.

He refers to the fifth sentence of section 9 (a), which provides: "Such rate shall be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture as of the date the tax first takes effect, and the rate so determined shall, at such intervals as the Secretary finds necessary to effectuate the declared policy, be adjusted by him to conform to such requirements."

This, I agree, clearly means that the Secretary, having fixed the rate by the formula is not required to make any downward revision of it, unless he determines that it is necessary to do so to effectuate the declared policy. He can extend the interval for adjustment as long as he thinks necessary, while in the meantime the automatic working of the formula may be giving a series of figures steadily descending below the tax which he has put in effect.

PRESENT RATE ILLEGAL

As a matter of fact that is what has occurred and, unless the act is so construed, the present rate is illegal by the terms of the act itself. On the basis of the latest available data the formula now gives a rate of 81 cents per hundredweight, but the rate of tax is and has been since March 1934 $2.25, and the Secretary proposes to maintain it at that figure until he is satisfied that a reduction of the tax will not destroy the desired balance. Not only is this the effect of the act, but the argument is a plain assertion by the defendant that the apparently definite and easily ascertained formula may be disregarded by the Secretary, leaving the policy of the act as the only semblance of control of his discretion.

The entire intent and purpose of the Agricultural Adjustment Act leads irresistibly to the conclusion that in enacting the processing tax the Congress had no idea of exercising the essential legislative function in that respect, but intended to turn it over to the Secretary of Agriculture to be used by him when and if he needed it as an adjunct to the general scheme for the rehabilitation of agriculture provided for in the body of the act.

OTHER CONTENTIONS NOT SUSTAINED

The remaining contentions of the plaintiff against the constitutionality of the tax are not sustained. But, in view of the importance of the questions involved and of the probable scope of the argument upon appeal, I think it proper for me to state briefly my views upon the other points raised.

The plaintiff argues that the tax is not levied for a public purpose.

The interdependence of agriculture and industry, the close relationship which exists between them and other factors in our modern economic life, are matters of common knowledge. I am satisfied that an act of Congress, such as this, which is designed to rehabilitate agriculture in the interest of the whole Nation, is for a public purpose.

The plaintiff's next contention is that the taxing feature is merely a disguise under the cover of which the Congress is attempting to enter and occupy a field barred by the tenth amendment—the regulation of the farmers' intrastate business.

It cannot be denied that the primary and immediate purpose of the taxing sections under consideration is to raise revenue nor that they do as a matter of fact produce revenue and have produced it in large amounts.

Granted that the purpose of this act is to influence farmers in the conduct of their business, that is not a regulation of commerce as to which the power of Congress is limited by the commerce clause, nor is it such an intrusion into the domestic affairs of the States as transcends the barriers set by the tenth amendment.

NOT IN VIOLATION OF THE AMENDMENT

I have come, not without doubt, to the conclusion that the tax does not contravene the fifth amendment. The plaintiff argues that it is arbitrary and capricious because the rate of tax bears no reasonable relation to the subject taxed, and that it is confiscatory because the rate is a variable, has reached a point where it is destructive and ruinous to the business of the taxpayer, and may, so far as any limitation in the act is concerned, go higher.

I do not think that it can quite be said that the rate of tax as actually imposed bears no rational relation to the article taxed. It is a flat rate per hundredweight slaughtered. It is true that the rate is set with reference to two factors neither of which have anything but the most remote connection with the subject of the tax. They are really the farmers' income today and what it was in an ideal period some 20 years ago.

Nevertheless, the rate as set is directly upon and in direct proportion to the value of the thing taxed, and I do not think in such case that the courts can review the reasoning or method by which that rate was arrived at merely because it is set forth in the act any more than they could inquire into the reasons moving the Congress in fixing the rate of any excise tax where they are not expressed.

TAX MAY BE ARBITRARY

It is true that a Federal statute passed under the taxing power of Congress may be so arbitrary and capricious as to cause it to fall before the due-process clause of the fifth amendment. This does not mean that the fifth amendment limits the taxing power but merely that there are cases in which what purports to be an exercise of that power may in reality be a taking of property without process. If the tax imposed is a genuine tax and does not conflict with any constitutional limit, the courts may not hold the tax void because it is too high or may become too high.

As to the remedy. The plaintiff may have a decree declaring the taxing provisions of the act unconstitutional in accordance with this opinion. I am entirely in accord with the views of Judge Dawson in Penn v. Glenn (10 Fed. Sup. 483), to the effect that the Declaratory Judgment Act applies and that the occasion is a proper one for a decree under it.

EFFECT OF DECREE

As to the effect of such decree, the following quotation from his opinion is in point:

"If, before the tax is collected, however, it is decided in a declaratory judgment proceeding that the tax cannot be legally collected, it is to be expected that the collector would respect the decision, although he would not be compelled to do so. If he did not bow to the decision, however, and later on it became necessary for the taxpayer to sue him for a refund, as is authorized by section 3226, Revised Statutes, as amended (26 U. S. C. A. 156), the trial court would probably be justified in refusing him a certificate of probable cause, and thus he and his bond would be liable for the judgment obtained.

"If the declaratory judgment proceeding is decided in favor of the taxpayer after the payment of the tax, it would no doubt be accepted by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue as binding upon him on an application for a refund, thus saving the expense and delay of a suit for a refund."

The matter of injunctive relief, depending in part at least upon the effect of the threatened collection upon the business and property of the individual taxpayer, matters as to which a considerable amount of evidence was adduced, and the notes of testimony not having been transcribed, will not be disposed of at this time. Meanwhile the temporary restraining order may be extended for a further period of 10 days.

CONGRESS AND THE COUNTRY—ADDRESS BY SENATOR LEWIS

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by the distinguished senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] on July 12 instant, the Senator from Illinois having been chosen to close the "Congress Speaks" series broadcast by the National Broadcasting Co. from the Capitol Building. The subject of the address is Congress and the Country.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I express my indebtedness for the compliment done me in choosing me to deliver the closing address to the country on the activities of Congress, just preceding what is known before the country as the closing of the session.

Let me remind the Nation that this present session of Congress has carried to conclusion legislation the most important and far-reaching in its effect on the destinies of the American people, than legislation of any session of Congress in peace time since the Civil War between the States.

I summon the country to note that often they have been frightened by the mere novelty of legislation. At other times, misled through the terror caused by misconception of the course of the President and expressing misunderstanding as to the purposes of legislation. I invite you to the fact of how oft you have been frightened by intimations of danger and threat of destruction to follow proposed legislation; when later you discovered that the legislation when shaped finally into an act of Congress never embodied any of the provisions which had been the basis of fear which gossip and rumor had attached to it, as dangerous to the welfare of the country.

May I illustrate with a few instances. In the legislation looking to the general control of the marketing of stocks and securities, known as the security bill, as to this you recall that finance, banking, and commercial circles were frightened under the charges that every form of commercial stock was to be controlled to the degree directed by governmental agencies and that private control and direction of the property were to be taken from the citizen. It was charged that under stock-exchange control all personal supervision and management of ownership by the proprietor was to be destroyed.

Now, I call you to note that the Government placed at the head of the system as director Mr. Kennedy, suggested by the Stock Exchange of New York and its allies throughout America. Today the system as now administered is praised by those who had condemned and we have the public announcement by those engaged in enterprise, that it is the most perfect system to the betterment of all concerned that had been devised under all periods of stock-exchange legislation on the subject.

I now invite you to the fact that time and time again in the last year you had the specter drawn before you of "inflation." The charge made was that America was destroying the standards of your money, "robbing it of gold value," and reducing it to a bubble puffed up with artificial value and inflated with false security.

Thousands of owners of securities disposed of their property at a loss under the influence of these terrors circulated.

Now, behold, when the legislation is finally concluded it brings out America as the first gold country of the world. It holds the largest supply of money gold in any country on earth. Instead of the cry of "Stabilize our money on the basis of other countries!" we are called on to supply France with gold to support her franc—and now to aid England and supply silver to support her silver market. In the meantime, we establish ourselves as the first money market of all the earth. For America we earned the highest standard of credit in existing time.

I now bring you to the late discussion and fright on what is known as the "holding bill", or the legislation for the control of holding companies.

You now see that all of the fears that Congress, made up of patriotic men of all political parties, was going to destroy the property merely because it was called "holding" had no foundation, you see we are merely seeking to prevent the illegal and unnecessary institutions from robbing the public and to assist the public in the protection of honest securities represented by honest property.

Lastly, you are now again in the shadow of a new cloud caused by the general belief that a tax bill proposed is to carry to final destruction all the possessions of the citizen done under the processes of tax appropriation and working confiscation by the processes of taxation.

I inform you, the people, that the leaders of Congress of all political parties are not the manner of people who would destroy their own constituents, rob their own citizens of prosperity, defeat their own prospects for return to power and finally rob themselves, their families, and their children of all their possessions. This would have to be done if they work such an infliction upon their fellow citizen as is now expressed in the fears of many of our people.

I inform you that the tax bill, when it comes forth in final law, carrying the approval of President Roosevelt, will be so adjusted as to apply only to the excess beyond the immediate needs of our citizens and in no wise to go further than the citizen himself would have been willing to pay in his own contribution to that which is being paid for the relief of the needy and oppressed citizen, his fellow countryman.

No confiscation, no appropriation, and no unconstitutional or unjust exaction will ever be laid on the citizen on the theory of just taxation to be passed by this Congress of the United States.

I now recommend to my fellow citizens that they pause at every instance of expressed fears and rumors of danger and reckon with the fact that the Congress is made up of patriotic citizens, high-minded officials of noble character and in themselves, taken all for all—have for their purpose the maintenance of the security of the Nation—the prosperity of the citizen, the honor of the country, and elevating the United States as the first country of the world.

To this object we are assembled and serving, and to this purpose we will conclude our efforts to the welfare of mankind and the blessing of the Nation.

FALSE ISSUES—ADDRESS BY JOHN HAMILTON

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an able address delivered on July 2 by my fellow townsman, John Hamilton, general counsel for the Republican National Committee, before the Women's National Republican Club of New York City. Mr. Hamilton is Republican national committeeman for Kansas.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

When I was asked by your chairman a few days ago as to the subject of my talk this afternoon, I told her that she might announce it under the title "false issues." Frankly, at that time I had given little thought to what I was to say here today, but I felt quite confident that the conduct of the Roosevelt administration for the past 2½ years offered a wealth of material for the subject I had chosen. Of course I was not disappointed in that for the entire Democratic strategy has been built up on false premises. They have consistently resorted to the old political tricks of either setting up straw men and then giving vigorous battle for the edification and delight of those who were not on the inside of the game, or they mount Mr. Roosevelt on the Democratic ass in the role of a Don Quixote and call upon the people to offer great hurrahs while this valiant warrior gallantly charges the windmill. Unfortunately for the Nation, including those who have made up the cheering section, their game has been played nearly to the point of political perfection. They were able at the outset by threats and intimidation to quiet anyone who had the audacity to venture criticism of policies or measures which were patently unsound and definitely injurious not only to our form of government but to the people for whose benefit this Government exists. That period has now very definitely passed, for men and women throughout this land of ours are beginning to realize the truth and are asking pertinent questions which must be answered. The chief agency to bring the real facts into the light is the Republican Party and it must accept that responsibility. The fact that we will be charged with destructive criticism by those connected with Mr. Roosevelt's administration is quite beside the point for their wails in that regard will be emitted for the sole purpose of diverting the American electorate from the catastrophic mistakes they have made. In due time the Republican Party through its legally constituted convention will offer a constructive platform to the Nation. Until that time we have not only the right but it is our obligation to searchingly inquire into the confusion that reigns in Washington under the leadership of a man who has no more of a program today than he did on March 4, 1933.

Of course, I can't dissect in the few minutes that are allotted to me all of the Rooseveltian straw men that have been paraded before our eyes for they are as numerous as tumblebugs in a Kansas wheat field and quite as irritating. I have chosen three typical instances which I believe will be of interest to you. They are the destruction of orderly legislation, the myth of "Roosevelt the humanitarian", and political corruption in the use of public funds. I have chosen these matters for the reason that each of them presents a typical case of political showmanship built around nonexisting facts.

In years past the Congress of the United States has been the open forum for the discussion of public measures. It has been the assembly ground of the direct representatives of the people. Within its halls have been fully debated the policies of the Nation as they were represented by proposed legislation and as they were construed by Executive orders and decrees. It was a healthy thing for the country that these matters should be brought out into the open for it not only allowed the Members of Congress to ascertain the views of their colleagues but it brought forcibly to the attention of the people both the merits and demerits of the matters under discussion. The lower House merited its name "the House of Representatives", and the Senate in time became known as "the greatest deliberative body in the world." But today these bodies neither represent nor do they deliberate. They have by cajolery, by political blackmail, and by coercion become the mere mouthpiece of the executive branch of our Government. The straw man in this case is to be found in the plea of emergency and loyalty to the President, and the agency used was the gag rule, under which debate was limited or forbidden and the right of amendment was denied. That there was an emergency may be admitted, but that it was not of such a degree as to justify the passage of laws which effected substantial changes in our economic, social, and political life without the bills even being presented to the Members of the House, without the right of amendment or debate will also be admitted by every fair-minded person.

The first important measure of the new deal was the Banking Emergency Act. This act gave the President war powers over all credit, currency, gold, silver, foreign exchange, and the banking system. It gave him power to prevent anyone withdrawing deposits, to close banks, to open banks, to place banks under Government control through conservators, to compel banks to issue preferred stock and sell that stock to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and by so doing give complete control of the bank to the Government. No one spoke upon the bill except the Chairman of the Banking Committee, who introduced it.

To say he introduced the bill is a technical phrase—there was no bill—the copy which he had was typewritten. It had been sent to him from the White House, with instructions there were to be no changes whatever in its text. The bill was not presented to the Banking Committee; it was not read to the committee. No member of the committee saw the bill. No Member of the House saw the bill. The whole thing was put over in 40 minutes purely upon orders from the White House that it was necessary. The famous Economy Act had much the same history. It was written somewhere in the executive branch of the Government and sent to the House with orders that it be passed as written. The Democratic Committee on Rules brought out a special rule providing that debate on the bill should be limited to 2 hours and that there should be no amendment permitted. The bill was never printed; no Member of the House ever saw it.

The act creating the Tennessee Valley Authority was pushed through in the same manner. Although this bill was more socialistic than anything ever before attempted by this Government, it was passed by the House under a special rule limiting debate to 6 hours and prohibiting amendment.

The Federal Emergency Relief Act, setting up the Federal Emergency Relief Administration and making an initial appropriation of $500,000,000, was enacted under a special agreement limiting debate to 2 hours and prohibiting any amendment.

The bill which rewrote the Home Loan Corporation Act and giving that agency authority to issue $3,500,000,000 in bonds and do all the other things which it is now authorized to do, was passed by the House under special agreement limiting debate to 1 hour and 30 minutes.

The banking reform bill—which completely revolutionized the banking structure of the United States, separating commercial banking from investment banking and prohibiting investment banks from accepting deposits and doing a general public banking business; which regulated branch banking; which created the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation—was passed under special rule limiting debate to 4 hours.

The N. I. R. A. was passed without right of amendment under a rule limiting debate to 6 hours, while the debate on the Frazier-Lemke farm bankruptcy bill was limited by rule to 40 minutes. If a little more time had been devoted to these measures possibly someone would have had the sagacity to determine their unconstitutionality. Not that this fact would have prevented some Members of Congress from voting for them.

Other bills shoved down the throat of the Seventy-third Congress via the gag-rule route include the Emergency Railroad Transportation Act, the Gold Reserve Act, the Civil Works Administration Act, the Security Exchange Act, the Federal Housing Act, and the Federal Communications Act. We might have expected that after the turmoil of Mr. Roosevelt's first Congress had died down future legislation would have been taken up in a more dignified and orderly manner, but no sooner had the Seventy-fourth Congress met than it became apparent that more of the same tactics would be employed.

The old straw man still had a kick or two left in him, and they used him to put through the Emergency Work Relief bill carrying an appropriation of $4,800,000,000—the greatest sum ever appropriated by Congress. I will say, in fairness to the President, that while he would not permit amendments to the bill he did recognize the existence of the House by granting its Members a rule which allowed them to debate this measure for a full 3 hours. In this session the gag rule has been applied to such measures as the second deficiency bill and the Wagner bill. It will undoubtedly be applied to many others. Perhaps the most grotesque, and at the same time, pitiful, example of this tendency to rush through legislation of major importance arose when the President ordered his new tax bill to be passed by both Houses of the Congress in a maximum of 5 days. The revolt against this was so wide-spread and deep-seated that the President had to retract his orders, while the obsequious Democrats on the Hill, who had blindly followed his orders, were compelled to accept the role of the goat in order to have the face of the President.

I have not attempted to discuss the merits of these various acts. I have simply tried to picture to you the very serious encroachment which has come about in our legislative procedure—an encroachment that has in fact destroyed the constitutional prerogatives of our Congress without actual change in the Constitution itself. It is the most amazing suspension of the Constitution by indirection that this Nation has ever witnessed, and it has all been brought about under the plea of emergency. It will not be surprising if in the tenth year of the reign of our Lord Franklin we shall see old man emergency still being used as the bogey to scare servile Congressmen out of their constitutional pants. There is an emergency, and it is not a straw man; it is the emergency that exists in the usurpation of the powers of the Congress by the President.

It seems to me that I might close this section of my talk with a slight tribute to SAMUEL B. PETTENGILL, a Democratic Member of the House from Indiana, who, in closing his remarks against the Wheeler-Rayburn bill, said:

"It has been said in the cloakroom that no one can speak against the drastic provisions in the Senate bill and retain his seat in Congress.

"If that be true, it makes little difference to me. If what I say terminates my public life, I shall walk out of here a man, not a coward."

Humanitarian legislation should be too vital a question for partisan politics; but since there are those who in belittling the Republican Party have seen fit to drag this subject into the arena, we can accept the challenge as a test of our idealism without the slightest trepidation. From whence came the first steps looking to the regulation of child labor, the establishment of maximum hours of labor, the supervision and inspection of working conditions, workmen's compensation acts, and a score of other similar social reforms? All, without exception, were first enacted as laws in States predominantly Republican and under Republican administrations. It was only in States having a predominant Democratic leadership that such advancements were consistently opposed, an opposition that arose from the fear that legislation of this character would serve to free the Negro and the white laborer from a social order that holds them in peonage from their childhood to the grave.

Let us consider the question of child labor, which is of unusual interest to us all and of peculiar interest to our women, for it also has a straw man in the attempt to picture the President as the great humanitarian.

If we are to view this picture solely as it has been drawn by the President, we can easily be led to the thought that there had never been a champion of child labor until he assumed the mantle of his office. We could easily come to the conclusion that the Republican Party was hard-hearted and wholly insensible to this problem. As a matter of fact there is nothing in the record of the President which would indicate that he has been at any time interested in child labor as such, nor is the Republican record on this very vital question such that we need in any way apologize for it. The last Federal census was taken in 1930 and if you care to refer to it you will find that there was compiled as a part of that census, certain tables having to do with the employment of children. It seems that in 1900, the total number of children employed in this country between 10 and 15 years old was substantially 1,750,000 and that this figure represented 18.2 percent of the total number of children of that age. There was a gradual increase until in 1910 the number of these children employed was slightly under 2,000,000, but from that date on there was a decided falling off of child labor and in 1930 there were but 670,000 children used in gainful occupation, or 4.7 percent of the whole. I think that it is not out of line for us to consider the reasons for this decided drop in the number of children employed in the trades, and I believe that the only reason which can logically account for that reduction is that in the period from 1910 to 1930 there were drastic laws enacted in many of the States of the Union which prohibited the use of child labor. This legislative reform was more noticeable in what I may call the normal Republican States and as a result we find that in the six territorial divisions which contain a majority of the Republican States as used in the census figures of 1930, New England showed an employment of only 2.2 percent of the children within the age limits mentioned; the Middle Atlantic 1.9 percent, East Northern Central States 1.3 percent, the West Northern Central States 2.5 percent, the Mountain States 2.6 percent, and the Pacific States 1.5 percent. In the Southern States, on the other hand, we find the Southern Atlantic group with 9.5 percent, the East Southern Central States 13.5 percent, and the West Southern Central States 7.3 percent. In other words, in the industrial Northern States, child labor had been reduced between 1910 and 1930 to a very negligible figure. While in the South where such protection was not assured by the legislative prohibition, the number of children still employed was greatly in excess of the general average of the country.

In Mississippi, the home of Senator HARRISON, this same census shows that in 1930, 30.7 percent of all boys and 18.8 percent of all girls from 10 to 15 years of age were employed in gainful industry. What is true in Senator HARRISON'S State, is also true in a varying degree in the other States whose representatives in the Senate and the House are regarded as spokesmen for the new deal. It might not be too much to ask that President Roosevelt, if he were sincere, should exert some of the influence of his public funds upon his political adherents to accomplish what has been done voluntarily in other States during the last 2 decades.

However, my point is not based so much upon the condition as it is upon the pretense as to Mr. Roosevelt's stand. It has been repeatedly stated by his spokesmen, including no less distinguished person than Secretary of Labor Perkins, that President Roosevelt has always been a very ardent advocate of the abolition of child labor. In speaking before the Kentucky General Assembly on February 21 last year, Madam Perkins made the statement that while the President was Governor of New York State he urged the ratification of the child-labor amendment. Now, it is fortunate indeed that Mr. Roosevelt felt so satisfied with his public utterances while he was Governor of your great State that he had a volume published entitled "Public Papers of Governor Franklin D. Roosevelt." This publication not only contained all of his official messages to the legislature, but his official statements while Governor, his executive orders, and his public addresses as well. I can say to you, without the slightest fear of refutation, that nowhere in this volume is there the slightest reference to the child-labor amendment which was pending every day of his tenure as Governor of your State. In none of his messages and recommendations to the legislature is there any record of his ever having called its attention to this amendment or of having asked for its ratification.

What I have said with reference to his public utterances while Governor applies with equal force to those made as a Presidential candidate. A check of a file of his speeches in the campaign of 1932, together with his statement to the press correspondents upon various occasions, fails to disclose any reference by him to the child-labor problem, to the pending amendment to the Constitution, or to any other phase of the problem whatsoever. The Secretary of Labor was either misinformed or was setting up such a straw man when she made her statement to the General Assembly of Kentucky. It is true that Mr. Roosevelt, as President, has made public statements in behalf of the abolition of child labor, but it was not until the N. I. R. A. became a law that he did so, and in this connection his statements were made as an argument in support of the continuation of the N. R. A., and not because of any deep personal concern in child labor as such. His plea for the necessity of the N. R. A.'s continuation upon the ground that if it were not continued we could not hope to rid ourselves of the evil of child labor was patently not in line with the facts when the statistics show that for a quarter of a century, with the exception of a few solidly Democratic States, we have made giant strides toward the solving of this problem by State legislation alone.

As I stated at the outset, the Republican Party need only have pride in the record which the State administrations have made toward the stamping out of this evil and we should not allow Mr. Roosevelt to take himself to the people of our country as the champion of the child-labor question. His public record does not bear him out in this assumption and we should not allow our people to go uninformed on this most important matter.

The third or last of my exhibits has to do with the administration of the emergency work-relief bill. Here he assumes the role of the gallant Don Quixote, with a sacrosanct attitude with regard to the expenditure of this fund, or for that matter of other funds of a similar character. Do you remember when, in June of 1933, at a conference of relief administrators, he said:

"This means a competent set-up in each State, preferably a commission of five or six well-known citizens who will not only administer relief in a businesslike way but entirely apart from partisan politics."

Have you forgotten that in the fall of that year he had a further conference with Governors, mayors, and civil works' administrators in which he told them:

"I want to tell you very simply that your National Government is not trying to gain political advantage one way or the other out of the needs of human beings for relief. I would like to have the rule adopted that no person connected with the administration of this $400,000,000 will in any single case, in any political subdivision of the United States, ask whether a person needing relief or work is a Republican, Democrat, Socialist, or anything else."

Only a few days ago he threw the same sanctified robe around the shoulders of his $5,000,000,000 fund with the statement to the administrators who had been called in to confer with him that politics should not in any way enter into its disbursement.

That was a splendid attitude to take with regard to such a large sum of money to be used for the ostensible purpose of relieving the distress of the unemployed, and at the same time to pump something of lifeblood into the arteries of industry. Apparently upon the theory that the Governors of some of the States to which this money was allocated would sin against the purposes for which the money was appropriated and conceivably direct it into channels of political purposes, all power of administration of this money was totally withdrawn from their hands even to the extent they were not consulted as to the men who were appointed administrators within their States.

Of course, there are those who believe the Governors of the respective States which are the recipients of funds would appoint men who would as efficiently administer them as some of the agents working under Mr. Hopkins at Washington. But that was not to be. The State administrations were not to be tempted in any way with these appropriations by political exigency. Thus, from the first, the picture has been drawn which seeks in its entirety to present an administration realizing its responsibility both to the unemployed men and to industry, and in that realization insisting that the money so appropriated should be spent within the channels for which it was intended and should not be touched by the sordid political hand.

It has turned out, however, to be a case where the left hand knoweth not what the right hand doeth, for when we look at the type of gentlemen who are to administer these funds in several of the States, assuredly we see the shadow of Mr. Farley and his practical policies cast over the whole picture.

Let us review the situation in Mississippi:

Mr. Hopkins first appointed as relief administrator in that State Mr. Aubrey Williams. Mr. Williams, without apparent political affiliation, tackled the job in a way that marked him as both an honest and efficient administrator. His work was so well done that Hopkins brought him on to Washington as his first assistant. His place in Mississippi was taken by Charles Brawn, who had made a splendid record as assistant administrator for the State of Texas, but now we find Mr. Brawn, despite his reputation as an efficient public servant, supplanted by a Baptist minister, whose chief claim to the position he holds is the fact that he is a more ardent disciple of Senator BILBO than of the Lord. The whole thing, of course, is tied up with Senator HARRISON'S bid for reelection in 1936. I have no doubt that deal will make it much easier for Senator HARRISON with BILBO'S aid to obtain his reelection than for the people of Mississippi to gain either an honest or an efficient administration of public funds set aside for their State.

In Indiana the State administrator is the former secretary to Governor McNutt. Anyone who believes that Governor McNutt's professorial career has in any way dulled his sense of political efficiency need only review the record of his administration in Indiana.

Worse than both of these instances, however, is the appointment in Missouri, where the program has been turned over to Matt Murray, the first lieutenant and chief adjutant of Boss Pendergast, who runs a Democratic organization in Kansas City that bows to none other in the country when it comes to efficiency in obtaining a fair share of the vote for Democratic machine candidates, both national and local. I have no doubt that this same efficiency will be applied to the use of the public money to be turned over to Matt Murray. In fact, it was done in the last campaign, for the Democratic organization in that State used a printed slip among relief workers that contained the following questions:

Name?
Party affiliation?
How will you vote this year?
Are you on relief work?
Do you want the work to continue?
Are you for the new deal?
How many voters in your family?
Do you want a car to call for you?

I presume that inasmuch as relief funds have been kept out of politics by the President, we should assume that these questions were asked and the information compiled for the purpose of an efficient administration of the money being distributed.

In addition to the direct use of Federal funds to bolster up the Democratic machine, as I have pointed out, it has also been used as a bludgeon over State and Federal officers.

At the outset of the Governors' conference held at Biloxi but a few days ago, the Governors assembled there, with but one or two exceptions, evidenced a decided animosity against interference in their States by the Federal Relief Administrator and even the President. Many of these gentlemen openly stated that this interference constituted unwarranted invasion of the rights of States to handle their own problems.

Governor FitzGerald, of Michigan, introduced a resolution protesting against Federal control of relief funds, "demanding that full control of welfare relief administration be placed in the hands of the States." According to the newspaper accounts, certain Democratic Governors who had theretofore given out interviews to the effect that they would not tolerate Federal interference in the matter of administering relief funds in their States, were called on the phone from Washington, some by their Democratic Senators, and others by persons high up in the administration. As a result of this pressure the conference abjectly surrendered and agreed to the demands of Washington that all machinery for the distribution and handling of relief funds and public-works funds in each State be wholly under the control of Washington, and that all individuals handling these funds be appointed by Federal authorities.

In order to make the picture complete Governor McNutt, whose secretary I have noted had been appointed administrator for the State of Indiana, moved to table Governor FitzGerald's motion. The conference ended with a resolution being adopted pledging the enthusiastic support of all the Governors to the President in this work.

What it was that was whispered from Washington over the telephone to these gentlemen that caused them to do an about-face is a matter of conjecture, but I rather imagine we would not be far wrong if we were to hazard the guess that they had been threatened with the withdrawal of Federal money if they did not play the game as it was dictated from Washington.

Nor was Biloxi the only place where politics was being played with this $5,000,000,000 relief bill. Several newspaper correspondents, including some who had been quite friendly to the administration, carried the story last week that on the day the Senate voted on the Wheeler-Rayburn bill the count of noses disclosed the fact that the bill would be beaten unless pressure was brought to bear from administrative sources. Unfortunately, Mr. Farley was absent from the city, possibly dedicating a post office, but Mr. Emil Hurja, Farley's right-hand man and the official patronage distributor of the Democratic National Committee, was called to the Capitol, and, after intensive work on his part for 2 hours, four votes were changed and the bill passed. It is an open secret that the administration's control over the $5,000,000,000 was a deciding factor in lining up the final vote.

From the picture as a whole we may fairly conclude that this fund will be used not only in an attempt to prostitute the electorate of the country but will and already has been used to destroy the freedom of action of both State officials and Members of the National Congress.

Those who have listened to the President's words may suffer the hallucination of fancying a nonpolitical administration of the funds that have been placed in his hands, but those who are not blind and see the machinery backstage know this is not the case. Those in the local communities who are familiar with the character of many of the State administrators to whom this money has been intrusted will be aghast that the task of distributing it has been given to men of admitted connections with corrupt political machines. The diversion of this money to political purposes has been fully expected, but it was not thought that it would be done in such a flagrant manner. The words of the President stand as empty gestures when we consider the facts—"The voice is Jacob's voice, but the hands are the hands of Esau."

I have on several occasions suggested this as a plank in the next Republican platform: "Governmental relief must be free from political corruption." I know Mr. Roosevelt's advisers will not consider that to be a constructive thought but it will at least be a novel one to them.

What I have said here today can be amplified a hundredfold. It is our task to see that the real facts are brought clearly before our people, that straw men should be depicted at their true value and that the Don Quixotes should be unhorsed even if we find a President of the United States among their number. If we will fearlessly and honestly present the facts the people of this country will assuredly rise against the present administration and we will once again see sanity and decency restored to our National Government.

FOREIGN MARKETS FOR AMERICAN COTTON

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter written to me by Mr. Oscar Johnston, manager of the cotton pool of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration.

Mr. Johnston spent some time in Europe at the direction of the President, investigating conditions affecting foreign markets for American cotton. Mr. Johnston knows cotton, including production, markets, and marketing, as few men do. His views are entitled to careful and thoughtful consideration by all who are interested in our cotton problems.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ADMINISTRATION,
Scott, Miss., June 20, 1935.

Senator J. H. BANKHEAD,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: This will acknowledge your letter of June 8, in which you request that I write you in a general way the result of my investigations of the world cotton situation during my recent trip to Europe. You especially ask my conclusions as to whether or not the price of American cotton is reducing our cotton exports, and if not, what, in my judgment, is the underlying cause for the rather serious decline in exports for the current year. I am very glad to give you the conclusions which I have reached as the result of a very careful study of the problems and of all available data upon the subject, both at home and abroad.

PRESENT STATISTICAL COTTON POSITION

At the beginning of the current crop year, August 1, 1934, the world carry-over of American cotton was estimated at approximately 10,600,000 bales, of which approximately 3,000,000 were in foreign countries and 7,600,000 in America. The 1934–35 crop is estimated at approximately 9,500,000 bales. Adding this to the American part of the carry-over we had available 17,100,000 bales with which to meet mill requirements for the current year. From this it is now apparent that the year's exports will be approximately 5,150,000 bales, and the domestic consumption 5,300,000 bales, or a total consumed and exported of 10,450,000. These figures indicate a carry-over into the new year, beginning August 1, 1935, of 6,650,000 bales in America. Consumption abroad has greatly exceeded imports; accordingly, the foreign stock is materially below the figure representing last year's stock. Foreign stocks will certainly not exceed 2,350,000 bales at the end of the current year, which added to the carry-over in America gives a world carry-over of American cotton of 9,000,000 bales.

Of the 6,650,000 bales in America, it appears that mill stocks, that is, stocks in consuming establishments August 1, will be approximately 850,000 bales, leaving a balance in the hands of the trade and/or producers of 5,800,000. Of this approximately 4,450,000 bales are in the hands of original producers, who have been advanced 12 cents per pound and who have incurred carrying charges of at least three-fourths cent per pound, so that this cotton is not available on the market until the owner can sell for a price equal to or better than approximately 12¾ cents per pound. Above that figure to 15 cents, it may be sold only at the discretion of the producer, and at 15 cents or better may be sold by Commodity Credit Corporation. Deducting the 12-cent loan cotton from the American supply, as being unavailable at present prices, we have left 1,350,000 bales; of this I estimate that on August 1 next, 550,000 bales will be held by the manager 1933 cotton producers pool. This leaves 800,000 bales of so-called "free cotton" in the hands of the trade. This is made up of miscellaneous and odd lots, representing stocks or left-overs of several hundred cotton shippers or merchants, from which desirable grades and staples and those most in demand have been selected. The mills of the world will require at least 1,000,000 bales to go through August and will probably require an additional half million bales before any appreciable part of the 1935 crop is available.

From the foregoing figures it is apparent that the world surplus of American cotton August 1 next—that is to say, the total carry-over less a normal carry-over—will be represented by the 4,450,000 bales financed by the 12-cent loan, and that so long as the market remains below 12.5 or 13 cents, the mills of the world will be compelled to obtain their supply of American cotton from the 1935 crop.

The average price of American cotton, middling seven-eighths inch, for the 10½ months of the current year, August 1, 1934, to June 15, 1935, is 12.40 cents per pound. This figure is the average of the 10 designated spot markets for the period indicated. It is evident that during the current year the world will consume at an average price of 12.40 cents per pound 11,200,000 bales.

EFFECT OF THE 1934 12-CENT LOAN ON EXPORTS

It is perfectly apparent from a study of statistics that the 12-cent loan was not a price-pegging or price-fixing device. With the loan in effect, the market price of cotton, as determined at the 10 designated spot markets, was 12.64 cents from the beginning of the season to and including March 9. During this period 4,171,961 bales came under the 12-cent loan. Since that date—that is to say, since the market break of March 11—only 386,000 bales have come into the loan. It is thus apparent that more than 5,000,000 bales of the current crop went into consumption with the market above 12.50 cents. The loan, therefore, was not holding the market up except during the period of time in which a large part of the crop was moved, except to the extent that it may be said that the possibility of the loan was a sustaining influence, psychologically valuable. On March 11, after 90 percent of the cotton that ultimately went into the loan had been pledged to Commodity Credit Corporation and when producers had disposed of that portion of their crop which they had not borrowed against, there occurred the drastic decline, and it was then physically demonstrated that the 12-cent loan was not a peg, for the market went down almost to 10 cents in a single day, and since that time has not been back to the 12-cent level except for a very brief period of time, shortly before the decision of the Supreme Court in the "sick chicken" case.

I am of the opinion that the 12-cent loan has made it possible for the producer to market his cotton in an orderly fashion. It has brought about accumulation of the world surplus of American cotton in the hands of producers who are soundly financed, so that this surplus may not be used as a depressing influence on the market. The 12-cent loan has certainly kept the market for spot cotton from suffering the decline which it would have suffered had the 4,450,000 bales of "loan cotton" been forced on the market by the producers during the harvesting season. It is possible that the fact that more than a million producers have received the 12-cent advance has taken from the market certain desirable types, which even at present prices would go on the market and supply mill demand, both in America and abroad, and that to this minor extent the loan may be responsible for some part in the decline in our exports, but this same thing would have been true had the loan been for less than 12 cents. The fact that 90 percent of the cotton which went into the loan did so with the market ranging from 12 to 13½ cents, and averaging 0.1264-cent, is conclusive evidence of the fact that the borrower took advantage of the market, with the hope of seeing cotton go materially higher as the control program progressed, and prompted by this same idea most of these producers would have availed themselves of the loan had the figure been lower.

It is contended that the 12-cent loan set an arbitrary price for American cotton materially above the world price, and that this fact stimulated the consumption of foreign growths to the neglect of American cotton. A study of the market trend in the world markets of American, Indian, Egyptian, and Brazilian cottons leads inevitably to the conclusion that the world market for cotton is the American market; that is to say, is the price at which American cotton sells. Cottons produced in the three other exporting countries follow the American market, the spread or difference between world prices for foreign cotton and those for American cotton remain at substantially a steady ratio through each season. Varying conditions, both economic and applied to production, cause these differences to vary from year to year and from time to time cause fluctuation in the same year. For example, in the early part of the current year and before the Sao Paulo crop from Brazil was ready for the market, it was estimated that that crop would be between 900,000 and 1,000,000 bales. The price for this cotton on the Liverpool market went materially below the American price, and there was much forward selling against the Sao Paulo crop. When actual harvesting began it developed that this crop would probably not exceed 650,000 bales. Immediately the basis for the Brazilian cotton advanced, until recently it has been 15 percent above the basis for the American crop, giving effect to the difference in spinning value. I quote from a market letter issued by one of the largest Liverpool spot-cotton merchants:

"The Egyptian market has naturally felt the full effect of the unsettled and unsettling condition in those of America during the past week and has exhibited weak spots on occasions in sympathy with the sharp declines in the American futures. * * * Despite the disturbing factor mentioned above, and also a decidedly quiet trade in actual cotton, the Egyptian markets have again demonstrated what a healthy undertone exists and what buoyancy underlies the position by responding immediately any signs of steadying here given by American values. * * * At the present moment the uncertainty regarding the United States position renders it impossible to do anything but guess the future course of Egyptian prices."

This same situation obtains with respect to Brazilian cotton. Those who complain that the 12-cent loan maintains an arbitrary price for American cotton will be forced to admit that if American cotton had declined to 10 cents per pound, it is almost certain the cottons from the other three exporting countries would have sustained similar declines, and would still be found selling in world markets in competition with American cotton. Carried to its logical conclusion, if the 12-cent loan is destroying foreign markets for American cotton, any loan, regardless of the amount, would have the same effect until the world price for American cotton reached a figure so low as to undersell the foreign production.

EFFECT OF 12-CENT LOAN ON FOREIGN PRODUCTION

It is my opinion that the 12-cent loan has had no effect upon foreign production. It is certain that in neither Egypt nor India has there been any indication of a purpose to materially increase production of cotton. Neither of these countries is planting as great an acreage as has been planted by them in the past. Brazil's increase and her active development of cotton production antedates the 12-cent loan and results from other causes mentioned below. Both in Russia and China, the other two major cotton-producing countries, efforts have been made for years to increase production. China protects her raw-cotton industry by a tariff. Russia is undertaking to increase her production by "collective" farming by the state. Neither of these countries has been a large importer of American cotton, neither of them is an exporter of cotton, nor is there any indication that they will ever be exporters except to the extent that Japan may develop cotton production in China in order that she may be independent of America, and if this is done, it will not be because of the price but because of Japan's desire to be economically independent of America. There is some slight increase in production in Africa. For more than a quarter of a century Great Britain has been spending millions of dollars in an effort to develop cotton production in her African colonies. This is a natural desire on her part to develop and to increase the buying power of those who trade with her and who under improved conditions will take more made-in-England manufactures.

CAUSE OF DECLINE IN AMERICAN EXPORTS

The outstanding fundamental factor which is working a serious hardship upon cotton producers of America by reducing exports and destroying foreign markets, is the international commercial or trade situation. Before the war, as a debtor nation, America owed abroad more than a hundred million dollars annually of interest to foreign holders of American bonds. The foreign population in America sent to dependent friends and relatives abroad almost a quarter of a billion dollars annually. These two items alone, without the importation of foreign goods, provided foreign nations with American dollars with which to purchase more than $350,000,000 of American commodities. Immediately following the war, Americans engaged in a perfect orgy of purchasing foreign securities and lending, directly or indirectly, American dollars abroad. This orgy extended to and included 1929. In 1930 we discontinued lending abroad; having ceased to be a debtor and come to be a creditor nation, our remittances against debt obligations ceased; the economic depression materially reduced the amount of beneficient remittances from foreigners residing in America; also, because of the economic depression, our high tariff against European manufactures and the lowering of the value of our dollar, our imports from abroad declined. It has taken approximately 3 years for the full force and effect of this combination of factors to make itself felt to the extent that it now is, and I seriously fear that if these factors continue to operate we have not seen the end of the decline in American cotton exports.

We know that in Germany the reason for the decline is purely inability on the part of German mills to obtain American exchange. During the crop year August 1, 1933, to May 2, 1934, Germany took from America 1,293,184 bales. During the same 9 months of the current crop year Germany has taken 346,971, a decline of 946,213 bales or 73.2 percent. During the same period France took 700,771, against 340,598, a decline of 51.4 percent. During the 9-month period the decline in American exports this year as compared with the preceding year is 2,562,802 bales. Of this 1,306,386 bales represents decline to France and Germany alone. Our exports to Great Britain declined from 1,153,174 last year to 655,602 this year, a decline of 497,572. It cannot be said that the decline in exports to Great Britian has been due to the inability of English mills to obtain dollar exchange. The reason here is directly traceable to our tariff. Great Britain enjoys a favorable trade balance with Brazil, India, Egypt, and Africa. India, Egypt, and Africa are a part of the British Empire and enjoy favorable trade relations under the Ottawa agreement with the mother country. Quite naturally preference is given by English mills to cotton from these countries, and equally naturally these countries are desirous of improving their trade balance by shipping cotton to Great Britain. Brazil is a large buyer of British merchandise. Great Britain has extended credit to Brazil during the current year. Great Britain takes but little of the Brazilian coffee, and, accordingly, Brazil seeks to improve her trade position and protect the milreis by shipment of raw cotton to British mills. Until and unless the American producer is in a position to undersell cotton from Brazil, India, Egypt, and Africa, Great Britain will continue her efforts to promote growth of cotton in these countries, to improve the economic condition, and increase the buying power of the peoples of these countries by encouraging production of, and by purchasing, cotton.

Cotton is regarded as a necessity at this time, for which as yet no satisfactory substitute has been developed. Increased production in India and Egypt will call for enormous capital expenditures, so, for sometime to come Europe will be compelled to take a considerable quantity of American cotton, but will continue her efforts to promote production of cotton in countries with which European nations enjoy more favorable trade relations, and will continue her efforts to improve and increase the production of artificial fibers until and unless America sees fit to make use of her greatest asset, viz, her buying and consuming power. I do not intend to suggest that we should abolish tariffs and expose American industry, both capital and labor, to ruthless competition with cheap foreign labor. Industry in America was doing nicely in 1929, yet in that year American imports were very much greater than they are now, particularly our imports from Italy, France, and Germany. I believe that a careful study of our tariff and the revision of those laws so as to permit the importation of those commodities which are not seriously nor materially competitive with American commodities would permit us to increase our imports, thereby furnishing exchange or dollars without at the same time putting in jeopardy any major American enterprise.

Henry A. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture, has accurately and fearlessly placed the situation squarely before the American public in his book, America Must Choose. We must, within reason and with proper regard for the major interests of a majority of the people, open our markets to the world or we must recognize that the markets of the world will unquestionably be closed to America.

The so-called "Johnson Act", limiting the freedom of trade with debtor nations, is a factor affecting our exports. Our antidumping and countervailing duties laws are serious factors affecting our exports. Our insistence upon our right to dump and/or to subsidize exports, while at the same time denying this right to other nations is not only inconsistent but unjust, discriminatory, and provokes prejudice against us.

Our insistence that the debtor nations pay their debts, either in gold or dollar exchange, while at the same time making it difficult, in some cases impossible, for them to obtain dollar exchange, is unreasonable and provocative of prejudice against American commodities.

It is urged that debtor nations are spending millions of dollars for armament, the maintenance of armies, while at the same time proclaiming their inability to meet their obligations to America. Those pressing this point ignore the fact that expenditures incident to acquisition of war material and maintenance of armies and navies do not necessarily require gold or dollar exchange. These expenditures are made with currency of the Nation involved, which currency we are unwilling to accept either in discharge of obligations or for purchase of commodities.

Attention has been called to the fact that American exports in 1934 showed an increase over those of 1933 of $500,000,000, and the question has been asked how foreign nations are finding exchange to pay for automobiles, agricultural equipment, machinery, electrical equipment, and other manufactures and at the same time justify a claim that they do not have exchange with which to buy cotton. The answer is obvious: Our increased exports was confined to industrial exports, manufactures, these exports went to agricultural countries, principally South America. The buying power of agricultural countries was raised by improved market level for all agricultural commodities in 1934 as compared with 1933. Our agricultural commodities go to industrial nations, as for example, Germany, France, Italy, England, etc. From these countries our imports have shown a material shrinkage; hence, while Brazil, with the dollar proceeds of her hundreds of tons of coffee, buys hundreds of thousands of dollars of gin machinery, oil-mill machinery, electrical equipment, automobiles, etc., Germany, having no such exports to America, is unable to buy our cotton, but turns to Brazil, from whom she purchases cotton at a higher relative value than we are asking for American cotton, and pays the purchase price for this cotton by shipping to Brazil railway equipment, machinery, etc. In 1934 industrial exports from America to agricultural countries increased hundreds of millions of dollars, while agricultural exports to industrial nations decreased.

EFFECT OF A. A. A. PRODUCTION-CONTROL POLICY

The production control of the A. A. A. has resulted in reducing the carry-over of American cotton from 13,250,000 as of August 1, 1932, to 9,000,000 bales as of August 1, 1935. This reduction in production has had no effect on the world supply of American cotton, since during each of the years there has been on hand, in stock, a surplus ranging from approximately 5,000,000 bales, August 1, 1935, to approximately 9,000,000 bales August 1, 1932, so that during the entire period covered by the control program there has been available to world markets not only an adequate supply but a burdensome surplus of American cotton. The market value has not been raised from the 6-cent level, prevailing in August 1932 to the 12-cent level prevailing now, for the 6-cent level was on a basis of the old-dollar value, while the 12-cent price is on the basis of a 59-cent dollar. The gold price of cotton in the markets of the world has not increased from 6 to 12 cents but from 6 to approximately eight and a half cents, so that in world markets to gold-bloc countries we are selling cotton considerably below the American-markets quotation.

Very naturally Japan is seeking economic independence of America. Cotton is recognized as a necessary war material. Japan is without cotton, oil, and minerals within her own empire, and is making a very natural effort to arrange for these necessary materials closer at home. So long as we continue taking from sixty to a hundred million dollars of Japanese silk annually, Japan will probably take an equivalent amount of American cotton. Their sale to us of silk gives them the necessary exchange, but in the event of trouble between America and Japan, Japan would find it necessary to obtain her cotton elsewhere. During such a time America could do without silk, but Japan would be compelled to have cotton. The inference from this situation is obvious.

So long as America has an adequate supply of cotton with which to fill world needs, the world is not seriously concerned with the quantity of cotton we produce annually. If it is argued that we must continue to produce a surplus, piling up millions of bales to be sold abroad in cutthroat competition with cheap foreign labor, thus further oppressing the cotton producer, lowering his standard of living and lowering his buying power, the answer appears to me that if foreign markets can only be bought with 6-cent cotton, they are too expensive.

SUBSTITUTE FIBERS

Italy, England, and Germany, as well as America, are making distinct strides in the development of synthetic cellulose fiber, offered as a substitute for cotton. Distinct progress was made in America when cotton was selling at 6 cents, when we had a carry-over of more than 13,000,000 bales. Italy has probably made greater advance in the production of synthetic cotton than any other country. Italy protects her synthetic fiber by a tariff of almost 5 cents per pound on the importation of raw cotton. Italy is seeking to develop her synthetic fiber for two primary reasons: First, to give employment to her population, much of her unemployment resulting from her loss of the American silk market; second, to protect the lira by avoiding the necessity for sending out of Italy funds with which to pay for importation of textile fibers. It is probable that efforts of the chemists and industrialists of the world to improve both the character and quantity of synthetic fiber will be continued. This is a menace that must be faced. The answer is not cheap cotton. The development has had its greatest impetus when cotton was cheapest. It is one of the manifestations of the desire of nations to become more economically independent, the one of the other, and particularly the desire to protect domestic exchange, resulting from depletion of gold reserves in payment for excess imports over exports.

THE ANSWER

It occurs to me that the Department of Agriculture should pursue steadfastly its adopted policy of controlling production so long as it has the enthusiastic support of the producers, and until the carry-over of American cotton is reduced to not more than 5,000,000 bales; that in the meanwhile producers be rewarded for their cooperation in this program by having at their disposal adequate credit facilities to enable them to market their cotton in an orderly manner and through the season; that at the same time America should carefully review her tariff policies, modifying and revising where necessary so to do, in order to bring about a more equitable distribution of commodities between nations of the world without undue hardship to American industry. Every resource of the Nation should be brought to play in an effort to develop both markets and uses for American cotton, and in view of the enormous proportion of the population of America dependent upon the cotton industry, directly and indirectly, every effort that is sound and economic should be made to increase exports.

Yours very truly,

OSCAR JOHNSTON,
Manager Cotton Pool.

AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ADMINISTRATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8492) to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] in the nature of a substitute for the committee amendment on page 45, beginning on line 17.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, yesterday I offered an amendment as a substitute for the committee amendment providing for a tax upon rayon. As I then stated, my purpose was to do what I believed to be fair to the rayon industry. I felt, inasmuch as it was proposed to tax rayon, that there should be placed an equivalent tax on silk.

Senators representing States where the rayon industry has great interests advise me that they are opposed to my amendment. I offered it solely to be helpful and believing that it was fair to the rayon industry. As they are opposed to it, I have no desire to press the amendment. Therefore, I am going to withdraw my amendment and let the vote come on the committee amendment reported by my colleague. I hope that those who hold the views that I hold, that there should be a competition tax upon rayon, will vote for the committee amendment, and, thereby, do justice to the cotton industry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina to the amendment reported by the committee is withdrawn.

PROPAGANDA RELATIVE TO INCOME TAX ON LARGE CORPORATIONS

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, a few days ago I had occasion to refer to the message sent to the Congress by the President proposing new taxes. At that time I pointed out that the increased income tax on large corporations would affect millions of small investors. I think the large corporations and their stockholders have a right to protest against any such tax. I think the Members of both Houses of the Congress will be glad to have the honest opinion of the people of the country upon this subject.

But, Mr. President, I hold in my hand exactly 100 typed letters, received yesterday and today, all dated July 16, containing exactly the same language and signed by individuals living in New York City, New Jersey, and the city of Baltimore. They were all addressed to me as a member of the Finance Committee and the envelopes were exactly alike and clearly written on the same typewriter. Such letters, of course, have no effect upon me except to annoy me, but I have no doubt that if I were prejudiced against the large corporations these letters would have the effect of increasing my prejudice.

It is difficult for me to understand how the executives of any large corporations could be so stupid or believe the Members of the Senate to be so stupid as not to see clearly how such letters originate. If the executives of large corporations see fit to notify their stockholders of the effect of proposed legislation upon them, I think no person can complain. I shall not complain if the suggestion is made to the stockholders that if they be sufficiently interested they might write their Representatives in Congress. It is not difficult for any of us to tell whether a letter is genuine or whether it is inspired propaganda. The genuine letter most of us are glad to get. The inspired letter is apt to create resentment.

Mr. President, this statement I make is not inspired by the hot weather or the length of the tedious session, which still continues. I make it only for the purpose of having the RECORD show what I conceive to be a proper conception of the right of the people to petition the Congress, and my resentment of the implication that Members of Congress can be influenced by the method I have described.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, while I am in complete disagreement with him on most of the issues involved in the tax question, I want to compliment the Senator from Delaware for his forthright statement bringing this matter to the attention of the Senate. I hope he will turn the letters and envelopes over to the lobby committee and let the matter be investigated so we may ascertain who is responsible for this manufactured type of propaganda.

Mr. HASTINGS. I may say to the Senator from Wisconsin that I shall be glad to turn the letters over to the committee, although I doubt whether I have kept the envelops in which they came.

AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ADMINISTRATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8492) to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the committee, on page 45, beginning in line 17. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 45, after line 16, it is proposed by the committee to insert the following new section:

SEC. 15. Section 9 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(g) There shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid (during any period after the date of the adoption of this amendment when a processing tax is in effect with respect to cotton) a processing tax on the first domestic processing of any material which results in the production of rayon or other synthetic yarn, at the rate of 125 percent of the per pound rate of the processing tax which is then in effect on cotton.

"(1) The tax shall be measured by the yield in pounds of finished rayon or other synthetic yarn.

"(2) The term 'first domestic processing of any material which results in the production of rayon or other synthetic yarn' means that amount and degree of manufacturing or other processing of such material from the spinnerette up to the point where the rayon or other synthetic yarn is in form either to be packaged and sold as such, or to be used in further manufacturing or other processing.

"(3) The term 'rayon or other synthetic yarn' means yarn suitable for commercial winding of a denier size exceeding 112 deniers. The term 'rayon yarn' shall not be deemed to include rayon ropes of more than 500 filaments.

"(4) The provisions of paragraph (1) of subsection (a) of section 16 shall not apply in the case of rayon or other synthetic yarn or the products thereof."

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the amendment before us provides for a tax on rayon. Subsequent to the approval of this amendment by the committee and during the discussion, my attention has been drawn to the fact that if this tax shall be imposed on rayon and its competitor, silk, it might have, and doubtless would have, a very disastrous effect upon the exportation of the very commodity which we are seeking to benefit and aid, so far as we can do so. I refer to cotton. We export 55 percent of the cotton we produce in this country. Therefore the price of our exported article and the demand for it abroad determines in large measure not only the size of our crop but its price.

I have been assured by those engaged in the export business, and who understand the condition of the foreign trade, that this tax, if imposed on rayon, would have a very disastrous effect upon the volume of our exports of cotton. It is contended, and rightfully so, by the rayon interests that if a tax is placed on rayon, a compensatory tax should be placed on silk, especially raw silk. The importation of that article, not only to this country but to other countries, and the price at which it is sold, largely affects the export of our raw material. Therefore, so far as I am concerned as chairman of the committee, I am perfectly willing that the amendment should be rejected.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next committee amendment passed over will be stated.

The next committee amendment passed over was, on page 49, after line 18, to insert the following section:

SEC. 19. Section 11 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is amended by striking out the word "flax" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "flaxseed."

Mr. MOORE. Mr. President, yesterday the Senate decided to eliminate flaxseed in the amendment found at the top of page 38. The section just read also should be eliminated to carry out the intent of the Senate. I move to strike out the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The same result will be achieved whether the amendment shall be rejected or stricken out. Therefore, the question is upon the adoption of the committee amendment, being section 19, page 49.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the next amendment passed over.

The next amendment passed over was on page 54, after line 20, to insert:

(b) Section 16 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(f) No refund, credit, or abatement of the amount of any tax shall be made or allowed under this section, unless, within 60 days after the right to such refund, credit, or abatement accrued, a claim for such refund, credit, or abatement (conforming to such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe) is filed by the person entitled to such refund, credit, or abatement, and no such claim shall be allowed for an amount less than $10."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This amendment was passed over on the request of the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY].

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, I should like to offer an amendment to the committee amendment. In line 1 of page 55, I move that "60 days" be changed to "120 days."

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, after the explanation which has been given, I think that is essential; and, so far as I am concerned, I agree to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee, as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the letter "(f)" ought to be changed to "(g)", since we have acted on a previous paragraph. I ask that that change be made in line 24 of page 54.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest to the Senator that the numbers of the various sections may all be changed upon the completion of the bill.

Mr. SMITH. To conform to the amendments? Very well.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from South Carolina, for information, what disposition was made of section 23, beginning on page 51 and extending over to page 52?

Mr. SMITH. It has already been agreed to.

Mr. KING. What disposition has been made of section 25?

Mr. SMITH. That has been agreed to.

Mr. KING. And what disposition has been made of the amendment on page 54, line 1, beginning "except as to flour processed from wheat", and so forth?

Mr. SMITH. That was agreed to; and the one beginning on line 21 was agreed to, with an amendment, where "60 days" occurs on page 55, so as to make it read, "120 days."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from Utah that all those amendments have been adopted.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I inquire of the chairman of the committee what disposition was made of the amendment commencing on line 16, page 54, with the words "and by", and extending down to and including the word "only", on line 20.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The RECORD shows that it was adopted on the first call of the committee amendments on the 10th day of this month. The clerk will state the next amendment passed over.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 57, line 22, after "(a)", to strike out "No suit or proceeding shall be brought or maintained in, nor shall any judgment or decree be entered by, any court for the recoupment, set-off, refund, or credit of, or on any counterclaim for, any amount of any tax assessed, paid, collected, or accrued under this title prior to the date of the adoption of this amendment" and insert "No Federal or State court shall have jurisdiction to entertain a suit or proceeding against the United States or any collector of internal revenue or other internal-revenue officer or any person who has been such a collector or officer or the personal representative of any such collector, officer, or person (nor shall any such suit or proceeding be brought or maintained in, nor shall any judgment or decree be entered by, any such court) (1) for the recoupment, set-off, recovery, refund, or credit of, or on any counterclaim for, any amount of any tax, interest, or penalty, assessed, paid, collected, or accrued under this title prior to the date of the adoption of this amendment or (2) for damages for the collection thereof"; on page 58, line 17, after the word "no", to insert "recovery"; and on page 59, after the words "of section 15", to insert a comma and "under paragraph (1) of subsection (e) of section 16"; and in line 2, after "17", to insert "of this title, or (4) any refund or credit to the processor of any tax paid by him with respect to articles exported pursuant to the provisions of section 317 of the Tariff Act of 1930", so as to read:

"SEC. 21. (a) No Federal or State court shall have jurisdiction to entertain a suit or proceeding against the United States or any collector of internal revenue or other internal-revenue officer or any person who has been such a collector or officer or the personal representative of any such collector, officer, or person (nor shall any such suit or proceeding be brought or maintained in, nor shall any judgment or decree be entered by, any such court) (1) for the recoupment, set-off, recovery, refund, or credit of, or on any counterclaim for, any amount of any tax, interest, or penalty, assessed, paid, collected, or accrued under this title prior to the date of the adoption of this amendment or (2) for damages for the collection thereof. Except pursuant to a final judgment or decree entered prior to the date of the adoption of this amendment, no recovery, recoupment, set-off, refund, or credit of, or counterclaim for, any amount of any tax, interest, or penalty assessed, paid, collected, or accrued under this title prior to the date of the adoption of this amendment shall be made or allowed. The provisions of this subsection shall not apply to (1) any overpayment of tax which results from an error in the computation of the tax, or (2) duplicate payments of any tax, or (3) any refund or credit under subsection (a) or (c) of section 15, under paragraph (1) of subsection (e) of section 16, or under section 17 of this title, or (4) any refund or credit to the processor of any tax paid by him with respect to articles exported pursuant to the provisions of section 317 of the Tariff Act of 1930.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This amendment was passed over at the request of the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, we have now reached the amendment on page 58, as I understand; that is, the portion stricken out begins on page 57 and the insertion is on page 58. The amendment on page 58 reads as follows:

No Federal or State court shall have jurisdiction to entertain a suit or proceeding against the United States or any collector of internal revenue or other internal-revenue officer or any person who has been such a collector or officer or the personal representative of any such collector, officer, or person (nor shall any such suit or proceeding be brought or maintained in, nor shall any judgment or decree be entered by, any such court) (1) for the recoupment, set-off, recovery, refund, or credit of, or on any counterclaim for, any amount of any tax, interest, or penalty, assessed, paid, collected, or accrued under this title prior to the date of the adoption of this amendment or (2) for damages for the collection thereof.

Mr. President, as I understand this amendment, it is broad enough not only to include the prohibition or denial of the right to go into court to test the recovery of a tax on the ground that the tax is or was unconstitutional, but it also denies the right to challenge the illegality of the tax by reason of the malfeasance or misfeasance of an officer. It denies the right of the citizen to avail himself of the courts for any purpose touching the legality of the tax.

I do not feel such a provision ought to be incorporated in this bill or in any bill. We should not deny the citizen the right to go into court to test the legality of a tax which he has paid.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. The citizen is not denied that right if he cares to resist the collection of the tax; is he?

Mr. BORAH. But this covers the tax which has been paid. This is for past transactions.

Mr. CONNALLY. He could have tested it when he was called upon to pay it, if he so desired, could he not?

Mr. BORAH. That is true; but why should we deny a citizen the right to go into court at any time and test the legality of a tax which has been laid on the part of the Government, and even though it involves the malfeasance or misconduct of the officer?

Mr. President, one argument has been advanced in favor of this proposal which I think has merit; and I desire to refer to that briefly before discussing some other features of the amendment.

It is claimed that in many instances this tax has been passed on; and I have no doubt that in many instances it has been passed on. I should not want the citizen to be given the right to recover for a tax which he had passed on to someone else. But that can all be taken care of, and should be taken care of, by a provision that when the citizen brings his suit the Government shall have the right to prove as a defense that the tax has been passed on. Not only that, but, in my judgment, without any provision whatever in the statute, the Government would have the right to make that showing, and it would be a complete defense to the action. I would be willing to place the burden of proof on the claimant.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I agree with what the Senator says; but may I also suggest that in some jurisdictions the taxpayer would not be able to collect the tax where he had passed it on, because he would not be able to show to the court any measure of damages. Nevertheless, if the provision should be written into law, that would make it universal, and show the intent of Congress in the matter.

Mr. BORAH. I have no objection to its being written into the law. In fact, I think perhaps that is a wise thing to do, although I am quite sure that failure to pay the tax would be a defense without any special provision being written into the law.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WAGNER. Does not the Senator think it would be fairer that the burden should be upon the taxpayer to prove that he himself absorbed the tax, rather than putting upon the Government the duty of proving that the tax was passed on?

Mr. BORAH. I should have no objection whatever to a provision that the burden shall be upon the taxpayer to show that he had paid the tax.

Mr. WAGNER. As I understand this bill, as to future taxes that very thing is provided for.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; although, in my opinion, he would have to show that. We must bear in mind that the taxpayer must first go into the Court of Claims, and secondly he must come to the Congress for his appropriation; and in my judgment there is no possible way by which the claim of a taxpayer could escape scrutiny on the question of whether or not he had paid the tax. All equities would run in favor of the Government. Anyone who has ever brought suit against the Government is familiar with that fact.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. In every instance the taxpayer pays the tax. He is required to pay the tax. The proposition is that as a result of the payment of the tax he requires the consumer to absorb it.

It would be difficult, if not impossible, to require the Government in all cases to prove that actually the processor paid the tax and then passed it on. We all know that the general rule is that taxes are passed on to consumers. It would seem to me that the fair rule would be to deny the processor the right to recover unless he can prove that he has not passed on the tax.

Mr. BORAH. Let me say to the Senator from Arkansas that I should have no objection to that. What I am objecting to is denying the citizen the right to go into court to test the question of whether he has paid an illegal tax. After he is once in court I care not what rule may be established as to requiring him to show that he actually has suffered a loss by reason of the imposition of the tax.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to ask the Senator from Idaho if it is not the universal rule in taxing districts of States and municipalities that where a taxpayer voluntarily pays a tax to the government, without serving on the government any notice of protest he is estopped from recovering the tax?

Mr. BORAH. There is a rule, of course, such as that to which the Senator refers; but that arises only after the taxpayer gets into court. This amendment proposes to deny him the right to bring a suit. This amendment closes the courts and denies all right to be heard.

Mr. LOGAN. That ought not to be done, of course. What I mean to say is that I cannot see much occasion for the amendment at all. The citizen has a right to come into court, and the Government has a right to say, "We have had this money; it has been used for governmental purposes without any notice that you were going to seek to reclaim it." That, I think, would generally be a good defense. So I can see no occasion at all for the amendment.

Mr. BORAH. I invite the Senator's attention to the language of the amendment, which is that "no Federal or State court shall have jurisdiction to entertain a suit."

Mr. LOGAN. Could we deny jurisdiction to a Federal court?

Mr. BORAH. I do not think we should take from a citizen the right to go into court to test the question of whether he has suffered by reason of the act either of the Government or of anyone else.

I am aware of the fiction which obtains that there must be consent before one can sue the Government; that is a matter I shall discuss in a few minutes. But where there has been an actual wrong suffered, a wrong sustained, where property has been taken and rights have been denied, I do not believe we can justly or legally deny a citizen the right to go into court. I do not think in all conscience we can deny him the right to bring a suit.

Mr. LOGAN. I agree fully with the Senator that where a man has a cause of action the doors cannot be closed to him, and particularly is that true if we seek to prohibit him from suing a collecting officer or an officer who makes an assessment. There may be some protection against suits as far as the Government is concerned, but there is a clear distinction between agents of the Government and the Government itself.

Mr. BORAH. When we were discussing this matter a few days ago I suggested that I thought some amendment with reference to the procedure after a suit was brought would be quite proper, and I should be perfectly willing, myself, to support a provision that the taxpayer should be required to disclose that he had suffered injury by paying the tax, and that he had not passed it on. I would put the burden of proof upon him, because the facts are peculiarly within his knowledge. But that is not what we are discussing here. We are discussing the broad proposition that notwithstanding it is admitted that a tax is illegally laid the citizen should be denied the right to go into the courts of this country to test the question of whether he can recover. That is the amendment which is before us, not an amendment which may be drawn for the purpose of providing the procedure after a suit has once been brought.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BORAH. I may say to the Chair that I am speaking on the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has 30 minutes.

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to ask the Senator if it would be possible to impose a limitation against the right to institute a suit for taxes which have already been paid, although there was no provision of the law providing a limitation on suits. Could we now, by an amendment here, provide that unless suits are brought within 60 days after the enactment of this measure, or any other time, no suit shall be brought to recover?

Mr. BORAH. I think we can pass a statute of limitations with reference to the time of bringing a suit. Sixty days, perhaps, would be rather short; but no doubt a reasonable time could be provided, and perhaps should be provided. Those are matters which, it seems to me, must arise after we have determined the question which is now before us.

Mr. President, the Government should be fair with the citizen. It should be just. In the last analysis, the supreme purpose of government is to administer justice—not alone, I contend, as between the citizens, but also as between the government and the people. The nonsuability of the government by the citizen originated in the most egregious fiction of all history, and that is, that the king can do no wrong. As a matter of fact, at the time this doctrine was first announced, the king did not do anything else but wrong. It was because he was often and continuously in the wrong in the treatment of his subjects that he could not afford to have his acts adjudged by anyone other than by himself. This doctrine can have little place under a government where the people have prescribed in their constitution limits beyond which the government may not go. If these limits thus prescribed by the people are broken and disregarded by the government, and the people are to have no redress, why place limits upon the action of the government at all? Indeed, it becomes at once an absolute government.

Under a system where the people have prescribed by their Constitution limits beyond which the Government may not go, it does not seem to me fair or just to the citizen to disregard those limitations and then say to him that he has no tribunal in which to test the legality of the denial; and that is precisely what is proposed at this time.

The matter of procedure after the suit is brought may be curtailed or limited within reason, but not the right of the citizen to sue to test the legality of the Federal Government or a State, or a citizen of the Government or a State.

If the Government, under cover of law, may enforce from the citizen large sums of money called taxes to which, under the Constitution, the Government is not entitled, and then if the Government may close the courts to the injured citizen, may deny him a right to be heard, that, in my judgment, is the very foundation stone of an absolute government. The citizen is not under these circumstances living under a government of law. He cannot claim that justice be administered without price and without favor. Admitting that for reasons which seem to me unsound, but admitting that the consent of the Government to be sued must be extended, yet I contend that that consent ought to be given with very few and rare exceptions. When the citizen has had his contract broken and the citizen has been unjustly deprived of his property, of his liberty, or his personal rights, when the citizen has been made to pay sums of money which the Government has no lawful right to take, he should be given a hearing in the courts of his country or before some tribunal which may adjust his rights and determine the amount of his recompense.

Justice Brandeis, in a paragraph of an opinion which he wrote sometime ago, used this language:

> Whether acting through its judiciary or through its legislature a State may not deprive a person of all existing remedy for the enforcement of a right which the State has no power to destroy unless there is or was afforded to him some real opportunity to protect his right.

Enlarging upon that, if it be true, as this amendment admits, that the tax was illegally collected—that may not be ultimately determined; I do not know about that, but the amendment proceeds upon the theory that it will be determined that the tax was illegally collected—then we are asked to deny a citizen the right to recover that which it is admitted was illegally taken from him. I do not think we want to incorporate that kind of a principle in the laws of this country.

It is true, as I said a moment ago, that some of this tax has been passed on, doubtless. It has been passed on in large measure by the large companies. However, I have a great number of letters and some telegrams this morning from small, independent companies, which were not in a position to pass the tax on, which could not pass it on, and, by reason of not being able to pass it on, they suffered great loss. If we deny those companies the right to go into court, we will have passed a law under which the large companies, having ability to pass the tax on, have passed it on, and therefore have not suffered; but we will deny to the independent company, the small company, the right to recover, although it was unable to pass the tax on. Viewed from every standpoint, it works an injustice.

I had intended to say something upon the question of the right and the power of the legislature to deny a citizen the right to sue his Government. I have not the time to go into that subject at present, but I do desire to say that while that principle has been embodied in our law it has been embodied there over the views of some of the ablest members of our courts. They have contended that it has no application under our system of government.

I maintain that under our system the highest power is not the State, not the Government, but the people. The people's rights are superior to the rights of the State or to the Government. The State and the Government are simply the agents of the people to preserve and maintain the rights of the people. The people made the Constitution, and when the Constitution is violated those who violate it must answer for its violation to the people. There is no divine right of exemption here in this scheme of government. The Constitution and the laws of the country are binding upon government and people alike.

Admitting, for the sake of the argument, that the fiction does exist, it is my contention that the right to sue should never be denied except in the most rare instances. I can conceive of conditions, during war, or some similar emergency, when it would be proper to deny to a citizen the right to go into court; but where we take away a man's liberty, where we take away his property right, where we deprive him of his money, it is my contention that he should never be denied the right to have a hearing in the tribunals of his country.

We have had experience with that kind of procedure in this country several times. It will be recalled that after the Civil War, when the reconstruction measures were passed, and military establishments were set up in some of the Southern States, men were sent to prison upon the orders of military commissions. It became necessary, in the view of those who were seeking to maintain the reconstruction measures, to avoid litigation upon that question.

A man by the name of McArdle, an editor in the State of Mississippi, was sent to jail under the order of a military commission. He sued out a writ of habeas corpus, as he had a right to do under the law as it then stood. The Congress a short time before had passed a bill providing for an appeal in such cases. McArdle sued out the writ, the matter was argued in the Supreme Court of the United States, the Court rendered an opinion entertaining jurisdiction of the writ, and then, while the case was still pending, the Congress passed an act denying the right to such parties to go into the courts of the country to test the legality of their imprisonment.

The result of it was the law was passed, the court was denied jurisdiction, and these persons were denied the right to go into the courts of the country and test the legality of their imprisonment; and those persons remained imprisoned under an order of a military tribunal in a constitutional form of government. There are several other instances of that kind. That may be government, but it is not a Government law.

We have now a situation here in which the legality of this tax may become very important, but I contend that under no circumstances should we establish the principle in this country that a man deprived of his rights, his property, his property rights, or his liberty should ever be denied the right to have a hearing in a court or before some tribunal which could determine his equities or his rights.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I was going to suggest—and I think I am right about it—that this principle which the Senator condemns, in which condemnation I agree with him, was transplanted from a country of kings on the theory that a king could do no wrong. We established a republican form of government here, and yet for some paradoxical reason we accepted this principle that the king could do no wrong. Upon that theory the courts have refused to take jurisdiction in the case where the Government resists.

Mr. BORAH. It is one of the interesting phases of our history with respect to this particular subject as to how it ever got into our jurisprudence at all. It originated, it seemed, from a single sentence in an opinion written by Chief Justice Marshall. There was no argument; there were no reasons stated; but after that time Mr. Justice Miller, while recognizing that precedents had been established, stated, as the Senator from New York has stated, that it had no applicability to our system of government; that we had no king, and we had no inherent sovereignty in this country; that we had none of the attributes of inherent sovereignty in this country; that the Federal Government possessed no sovereignty save that which is given to it by the express terms of the law, and the only basis upon which this can be found is the matter of the inherent sovereignty or the right of the sovereignty to be exempt from question by its citizens. At the same time we profess to be living under a form of government in which not the State, not the Government, is the supreme power, but the people are the supreme power, and the people give to the State or give to the Government whatever power they see fit to choose to give. They have never given to the Federal Government exemption from suits by the citizen who has been wronged. I cannot but believe if this was a new question it would be possible to evict this theory from our constitutional form of government.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I am very much interested in what the Senator says, and I agree with him. Since he has quoted Mr. Justice Brandeis, I will say that I was astounded when I was shown an opinion by Mr. Justice Brandeis, in the case of Lynch v. U. S. (292 U. S. 571), from which I read the following language:

> Although consent to sue was thus given when the policy issued, Congress retained power to withdraw the consent at any time. For consent to sue the United States is a privilege accorded, not the grant of a property right protected by the fifth amendment. The consent may be withdrawn, although given after much deliberation and for a pecuniary consideration.

Further on in the decision Mr. Justice Brandeis says, after citing cases:

> The sovereign's immunity from suit exists whatever the character of the proceeding or the source of the right sought to be enforced. It applies alike to causes of action arising under acts of Congress, and to those arising from some violation of rights conferred upon the citizen by the Constitution.

Justice Brandeis maintains that the sovereign may not be sued except by its consent.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I stated in the beginning that the fiction had been inducted into our law and was now recognized as a fact in our law. I do not deny that. I do say, however, that it has been contested in the opinion of able judges from the case of Georgia against Chisholm to the present day.

Let me read a single sentence from Mr. Justice Miller in a majority opinion, in the case of United States v. Lee (106 U. S. 206). I think Mr. Justice Miller is regarded as one of the greatest justices who has sat on the Supreme bench. He said:

> As no person in this Government exercises supreme executive power, or performs the public duties of a sovereign, it is difficult to see on what solid foundation of principle the exemption from liability to suit rests.

And I think it is difficult to see. However, I admit that it is here. What I am saying is that though it does exist, yet so strong is the argument against it that the consent should rarely if ever be denied.

Mr. President, more and more the Government is entering the field of private enterprise; more and more the Government is coming in competition with the citizen in his daily concerns. At the same time the Government is constantly demanding sacrifices of the people in the way of increased taxes. Now, it is proposed to add to all this a disregard of the simple principles of justice. A government which is unwilling to open the courts to its wrongdoing as against the citizen is not far from being a government of lawlessness, a government of force.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator's last statement has made partially clear the subject matter about which I wished to question him. I understand the Senator concedes that no right to sue the Government exists except by consent, that is, by a statute. Unless a statute be passed or exists authorizing suits, no action can be maintained in any court against the Government unless it be a proceeding in habeas corpus, which cannot be suspended except during time of insurrection or rebellion. Why does the Senator refer to this very fundamental principle as a "fiction"?

Mr. BORAH. What is that?

Mr. ROBINSON. Why does the Senator from Idaho refer to the fundamental principle that no suit or action against the Government can be maintained except by its consent as a "fiction"? Does not the Senator recognize that from the beginning of the Government that principle has been adhered to, that no one can sue the Government unless the Government consents?

Mr. BORAH. I will explain to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does not the Senator know that the right to sue now is limited and confined to those cases in which the statute authorizes suits?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I will explain to the Senator. As I said in the beginning, this principle that one could not sue the sovereign originated in the fact that the king could do no wrong. It never had any expression in the laws of England. It never had any statute supporting it in the laws of England at the time it started. It rested entirely upon what I claim is a pure fiction, and that is, that the king can do no wrong.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BORAH. In just a minute. That came down to us and was accepted. There is not in the Constitution of the United States a line or a letter indicating exemption of the Government from suit by the citizen.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, does the Senator intend by that declaration to maintain that the right to sue the Government should be unlimited and unrestricted; that there should be no limitation whatever upon actions or proceedings against the Government?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if I had my way about it, that is exactly what I would contend; but I recognize the fact that I am closed on that proposition by the precedents which exist, but I am not closed on the proposition that universal consent, with very rare exceptions in time of war, should be the policy of the Government of the United States. When a citizen has been wronged, when his liberty has been taken away from him, or his property has been taken from him, I cannot conceive why, under a free government, he should not have a right to be heard. It is a fiction, an egregious fiction, a falsehood and libel upon free government.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, may I say in the time of the Senator from Idaho that I do not agree with the statement of the Senator from Idaho, and will take occasion in my own time to reply to it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Idaho on the bill has expired.

Mr. BORAH. I will reserve my 15 minutes on the amendment.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I do not know whether I am intruding on anyone's time. If not, I wish in my own time to say a word at this time on the subject raised by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois indulge me just a moment to speak on the amendment, and then he may resume the floor.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to address myself directly to the subject under discussion, but I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator has the floor, and I will speak on the subject later.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] has the floor.

Mr. LEWIS. I ask my friend from Idaho, in view of the argument the Senator makes, that the right to sue or the right to withhold the suit is one which he regards as fundamental, whether his attention has been drawn to the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Monaco v. Mississippi (292 U. S.), in connection with which I take the liberty to ask the Senator's kind attention to the observation of the Supreme Court of the United States, where it quotes Mr. Hamilton as follows:

> Hamilton, in the Federalist, No. 81, made the following emphatic statement of the general principle of immunity:
> "It is inherent in the nature of sovereignty not to be amenable to the suit of an individual without its consent."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator there?

Mr. LEWIS. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, I have read what Mr. Hamilton said. He bases it upon a proposition, which, in my judgment, if I may be so presumptuous as to say so, does not exist in the American system of government; that is, upon inherent sovereignty and inherent attributes of sovereignty. The Supreme Court has said there is no such thing as inherent sovereignty in this country; that we have none of the attributes of inherent sovereignty in this country; and, while Mr. Hamilton thought we had, I cannot bring myself to believe that there are any attributes of inherent sovereignty in the Government of the United States.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I find no difficulty in differing in principle with my able friend, but recalling that the able Senator from Idaho, as a just champion of the Constitution, prefers to rest the Constitution on its language, I call his attention to this particular matter, that, apart from Mr. Hamilton, the Supreme Court of the United States in this case has occasion to refer to the case of Chisholm against Georgia, in Second Dallas, an opinion by Mr. Justice Iredell, and then, in this late case, to which I ask my able friend to give consideration, after referring to the case of Chisholm against Georgia, uses something of the language of the Senator from Idaho has just used:

> But this decision created such a shock of surprise that the eleventh amendment was at once proposed and adopted. As the amendment did not in terms apply to a suit against a State by its own citizen, the Court had occasion, when that question was presented in Hans v. Louisiana (supra)—a case alleged to arise under the Constitution of the United States—to give elaborate consideration to the application of the general principle of the immunity of States from suits brought against them without their consent. Mr. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion of the Court and, in view of the importance of the question, we quote at length from that opinion to show the reasoning which led to the decision that the suit could not be maintained. The Court said (134 U. S. pp. 12 et seq.): "Looking back from our present standpoint at the decision in Chisholm v. Georgia, we do not greatly wonder at the effect which it had upon the country. Any such power as that of authorizing the Federal judiciary to entertain suits by individuals against the States, had been expressly disclaimed, and even resented, by the great defenders of the Constitution, whilst it was on its trial before the American people." After quoting the statements of Hamilton, Madison, and Marshall, the Court continued.
> "It seems to us"—

This is the opinion of the Supreme Court speaking for itself—

> "It seems to us that these views of those great advocates and defenders of the Constitution were most sensible and just; and they apply equally to the present case as to that then under discussion. The letter is appealed to now, as it was then, as a ground for sustaining a suit brought by an individual against a State. The reason against it is as strong in this case as it was in that. It is an attempt to strain the Constitution and the law to a construction never imagined or dreamed of. Can we suppose that, when the eleventh amendment was adopted, it was understood to be left open for citizens of a State to sue their own State in the Federal courts, whilst the idea of suits by citizens of other States or of foreign states was indignantly repelled? Suppose that Congress, when proposing the eleventh amendment, had appended to it a proviso that nothing therein contained should prevent a State from being sued by its own citizens in cases arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States; can we imagine that it would have been adopted by the States? The supposition that it would is almost an absurdity on its face.
> The truth is that the cognizance of suits and actions unknown to the law and forbidden by the law was not contemplated by the Constitution when establishing the judicial power of the United States * * *."

I wish to call the attention of the able Senator to this point: That the Supreme Court of the United States finds it agreeable to give the exemption from suit without the consent of the sovereign; and, while my able friend may be right, and undoubtedly is right, upon the basis that it ought not to prevail, nevertheless there are those who are contending just now that, because the present administration desires to give a construction of the Constitution which will carry out the purposes of government and because it does not run according to the letter of the organic law, therefore it is violating the Constitution.

It appears to me, considering the argument of the able Senator from Idaho, that those who believe that the privilege such as is extended of exempting the sovereignty from being sued without its consent must note that the Supreme Court of the United States insists upon the right as a right not only of sovereignty but as a protection of the Government.

So we respectfully insist, since it is adhered to by the Supreme Court as its last declaration, that it is a right; and, while the Senator from Idaho may be correct and I may be correct and we all may be correct in wishing that it were not so, yet since it is declared to be the law, as an essential to the Government itself, why should we not have the right, then, to enforce it in the protection of this administration and the laws of government in the manner that is now admitted by the Supreme Court of the United States is the only proper one they will recognize as obtaining?

I ask my able friend if he will not give attention, at his convenience, to this opinion in the case of Monaco against the United States in 292 United States on page 313?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have read that opinion, as I have endeavored to read all the opinions on this subject from the case of Chisholm against Georgia in Second Dallas down, and I say to the Senator that, from the beginning, I recognize that this principle has been in our system, and the only question involved here is whether we will give consent. I do not believe in the theory, but I realize that it has been recognized.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, finding myself not in accord with some of the views expressed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], I wish to point out, first, that the amendment does not deny the right to question the validity of the tax. It is limited to barring suits for recovery of the tax.

One must realize that, in a practical sense, this amendment constitutes a denial of the right of the taxpayer to recover a tax which may be held to have been illegally collected. The language of the amendment is very clear. It reads:

> Nor shall any judgment or decree be entered by any such court (1) for the recoupment, set-off, recovery, refund, or credit of, or on any counterclaim for, any amount of any tax, interest, or penalty, assessed, paid, collected, or accrued under this title prior to the date of the adoption of this amendment or (2) for damages for the collection thereof.

It is clear, from a reading of the language, that what is attempted is to prevent the taxpayer from recovering the amount he has paid, even though the Court may hold finally that the tax was wrongfully levied or illegally collected.

The first question that arises under the argument of the Senator from Idaho is whether there exists the power of withdrawal of the right to sue. I understand him to admit that, technically, it is possible, it is constitutional, to adopt this amendment, but that, morally, it is objectionable to do so.

If there be any question as to the power to deny the right to sue, I refer to the cases cited by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], and to every other case decided by any United States court that has ever come to my knowledge. The opportunity has not been afforded of refreshing my memory touching the various cases, but I have come to regard it as a settled principle of law that no sovereign can be sued except with the consent of the sovereign.

The Senator from Idaho assails the moral soundness of that proposition and asserts that in a republic such as ours there ought to be no limitation whatever on the right to sue. We may readily understand that this principle of immunity from suit on the part of the sovereign has been the outgrowth of centuries of experience. If the United States today were subject to suit in every claim or action that might be urged or presented, I ask the Senate to consider what amount of recoveries would be possible in the various jurisdictions that exist?

It is for the very reason that questionable and unfairly augmented claims are often presented that the sovereign retains the right to say in what instances and in what jurisdiction it will submit itself to civil actions. If the question of the immunity of the sovereign from legal suits remains in any measure of doubt, I am unable to know how doubt arises in view of the almost unanimous weight of the authorities. There is a line of cases which addresses itself to my approval, namely, that when a sovereign departs from the exercise of sovereign authority to engage in what normally is private business, it ought to submit itself to the jurisdiction of the courts.

I shall assume, then, that no difficult question arises as to the power of the Congress to adopt the committee amendment, and for a few moments I shall make reference to the merits of the controversy.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has admitted in his argument that in the large cases—that is, in cases where great amounts of taxes have been paid—the tax has been passed on. There has come to my knowledge no instance in which the tax has not been passed on. It would be improper for me to assert that no such instance exists, but I shall quote the Senator from Idaho himself in several forceful public addresses in which he asserted that the custom is to pass on the processing tax.

Before doing that, however, let me take note of another statement made by the Senator from Idaho, the correctness of which as a principle of law is questioned. He said that the right in the Government to assert and prove that the processing tax in a given case was passed on to the consumer or passed back to the producer, exists independent of statute. We have had thousands of suits or proceedings against the Government for the recovery of taxes illegally collected. I can recall no case, though such a case may exist of which I have no knowledge, in which it was held that the taxpayer's right to recovery was restricted by the issue as to whether he had passed on the tax. Universally, so far as I know, the practice has been, if the tax is illegally paid and the right of action is granted by the sovereign for its recovery, that the question as to what price the taxpayer received for his commodities does not enter into his right of recovery.

If any Senator knows of a contrary rule being asserted by any court in any tax case which has arisen by the authority of the sovereign since the beginning of the Government, I should like to have him point it out now—unless the right was restricted by a statute.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. BAILEY. This is probably the first tax ever imposed by this Government with the intention that it should be passed on.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, what about the various gasoline taxes which have been imposed for many years throughout the country? They are all passed on, and that is the principle which is involved in this case.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; and if it is held that the gasoline tax is illegally levied and collected the taxpayer recovers his tax. That is true in the instance of every tax of which I have heard.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. The taxpayer could not sue to recover the gasoline tax, because there is no doubt of its legality. The sovereign has never been sued for that reason.

Mr. ROBINSON. I can conceive of a case in which the gasoline tax might be levied and collected when there was no authority of law for it. However, I do not wish to enter into what appears to be a more or less irrelevant discussion.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. I agree with what the Senator has said as to recovery, but the Senator does not question the authority of Congress to provide a procedure; that is, to establish or to provide that the burden of proof shall be upon the taxpayer to show that he did not pass on the tax?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly not. If I have not made myself clear on the proposition, let me add that this is the legal principle which I assert:

First, the right to sue the Government does not exist except with the consent of the Government. That consent may be given upon condition or without condition. If condition is imposed, the condition must be observed and enforced.

The right to withdraw consent to be sued follows, in my judgment. The sovereign may at any time withdraw the consent which was given that it might be sued and may deny the right to sue.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The right to withdraw consent has been exercised by the Government and by the Congress.

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, yes. This is a proposal to exercise that right now.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I think the Senator did not understand the point I was trying to make.

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, yes, I do. The Senator asked me the question, while admitting that the right to sue does not exist without consent, if we provide for a right to sue and put in the statute a condition that the party suing must bear the burden of proof, whether that condition would be valid.

Mr. WAGNER. Exactly; and if we should not provide for the condition but simply granted the right to sue, then the burden would not be upon the taxpayer to establish that he did not pass on the tax.

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly. I have maintained as clearly as I am able to express myself that the right to offset or defeat a recovery does not exist on the ground that the tax has been passed on unless it be expressly asserted in the statute. If it be asserted, the burden of proving that it has been passed on may be imposed by statute either on the claimant or on the Government.

Mr. WAGNER. The reason why I asked the Senator the question was to emphasize the point which has been contended here, a rule I never heard of before, that a taxpayer in an action of this kind, where the consent of the Government is given, must also establish not only that he paid a tax which was illegally exacted, but that he did not pass it on to the consumer. I never before heard of that principle.

Mr. ROBINSON. I never did either. I do not believe the principle is sound, and that is why I question the correctness of the statement of the Senator from Idaho.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). The time of the Senator from Arkansas on the amendment has expired.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then I shall take a little time on the bill, if I may be permitted to do so.

The Senator from Idaho this morning in his remarks recognized that in the cases involving large amounts the tax has been passed on, but he says that in numerous instances that has not been done by small taxpayers.

I do not object to the principle that if one who has paid this tax has actually borne it, and the Supreme Court holds the tax to have been illegally collected, he should be entitled to recover; but I now make the assertion that in almost if not quite in every instance the tax has been passed on, and the persons who paid the tax cannot be identified; and when we give the right of recovery to the taxpayer, in 999 cases out of 1,000 we shall be paying a bonus to someone who is not entitled to it.

Of course, the only theory upon which anyone here or elsewhere can justify the right to sue the Government for the recovery of this tax is that it has been actually borne by the person or corporation paying it; that he did not pass it on. If he did pass it on, I wish someone would clear my mind and conscience on the proposal that he should be permitted to collect it from the persons with whom he trades, from the producers or the consumers, and then be reimbursed for it by the Government of the United States.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield; certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. Even if the payer of the processing tax were permitted to sue to recover it, and did recover it, and it turned out that he had passed it on, how could the man to whom he passed it on, and who paid it, go into court and prove that in the price of the things he had bought the tax had been passed on to him and that he should be allowed to recover it in turn from the processing-tax payer?

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator's question is the justification for going straight to the point, as this amendment goes, and denying the right to sue. How could one prove that the price of a commodity had been raised so as to pass on the tax? Let Senators who are lawyers give a little thought to that. Assuming that the burden of proof were on the Government, as the Senator from Idaho suggests——

Mr. BORAH. No; the Senator from Idaho did not suggest that.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then I withdraw the statement. I thought he did suggest it. I am sure the Senator will find, if he will look at the report of his remarks, that he did, at one time in his remarks, suggest that the Government should be required to prove that the tax had not been passed on. Then he also said that he should have no objection to an amendment requiring the burden of proof to be borne by the claimant; but I know the Senator does not wish to quibble about differences in the meaning of language.

Mr. BORAH. If I made the statement, it was in error, because I certainly do not wish to have the Government refund a tax which has not been paid by the one who brings suit.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator will look at the report of his remarks, I think he will find that the proposition was discussed in that way, although I do not think at that time the question had been directly raised as to who should bear the burden of proof. Later it was raised, and the Senator from Idaho accepted the principle that the claimant should carry the burden, as I understood him; so, after all, that is a question which passes out of the debate.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. I asked the question because I think it would be a much wiser as well as a fairer policy to provide for a rule of evidence that the burden of proof shall be upon the taxpayer to prove that he did not pass on the tax, but permit him to sue in court. This very bill recognizes the justice of that principle, because, as I understand, as to actions for future taxes collected, it permits the taxpayer to sue and provides that the burden shall be upon him to show that he did not pass on the tax. So in this very bill as to some taxpayers we provide one principle and as to others we absolutely foreclose an action. That seems to me to be a rather inconsistent position.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, of course, the reason for the distinction grows out of the fact that an inferior court recently held the tax invalid; and, therefore, a distinction is made between those upon whom the tax may be hereafter imposed and those upon whom it has been heretofore imposed.

Mr. WAGNER. Is the Senator accurate about that? I think this amendment was incorporated in the bill by the committee before the Massachusetts case was decided.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. May I say, relative to the statement of the Senator from Arkansas, that numerous lower courts had so held.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; that is true. My remarks should be amended to take note of the fact that in addition to the decision which I particularly had in mind, and which probably was rendered about the time the amendment was adopted by the committee, or even afterward, there were numerous other cases in other courts in which the question of the validity of the tax had been adversely ruled upon; so that the question arose before the committee as to how the matter should be dealt with.

As a practical proposition, I doubt if it would give the taxpayer any substantial advantage to be accorded the right to sue, and then to have imposed on him the burden to prove he did not pass on the tax. I think if he did prove it, in many cases he would use unreliable testimony. In most cases he has passed on the tax. That was what he was expected to do, and he did it wherever he could, and I doubt if he failed to do it in very many instances. The consumer has paid it. We do not know, and the man who first paid the tax does not know, who the actual consumers were. The product may have passed through the hands of any number of dealers, and the man who finally paid the tax cannot be identified. The processor has been compensated for his loss by passing on the tax, and the man who actually and ultimately paid the tax cannot be identified. That is the sound reason, and, in my judgment, the only sound reason, justifying this amendment.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield just once more?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. I do not wish to disturb the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON. No; that is all right.

Mr. WAGNER. If that be true, why do we adopt a different principle as to the future taxpayer? Why should there be a discrimination between the two?

Mr. ROBINSON. I have not read the amendment to which the Senator refers; and I do not know that there should be any discrimination between the two.

I wish now to refer to some remarks which have been attributed by the press to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], whose position, so far as it was defined heretofore, is that this tax is almost universally passed on.

In a radio speech on March 22, 1934, which he placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on the following day, and

> Take our experience with hogs. Pigs were destroyed, the farmer was induced to curtail production, a processing tax was laid. But in the effort of the processor to compel the consumer to take care of this tax it was found that the consumer did not and could not do so. He bought less meat. Therefore the packer passed the tax back to the producer in the form of lower prices for his hogs. There is just so much purchasing power in the country; and when you increase the price prior to increasing the purchasing power, the consumer must deny himself and eat less or eat not at all. When you levy a tax, somebody must pay the tax. The inevitable tendency is to pass the tax to the low man in the economic set-up, and, therefore, the incident of the tax is at last with those who cannot pass it on. First, it is passed to the consumer who refuses to buy, then it is passed to the producer who cannot pass it on and must absorb the tax. He has nobody to whom he can transfer it.

There is a general declaration. True, it was made in connection with a speech about hogs; but the general declaration is that the universal rule is to pass the tax first to the consumer, and, if he cannot and will not pay it, then to pass it back to the producer in the form of reduced prices for his products. Upon what theory, then, should the taxpayer who has already been reimbursed by increased prices for the commodities he has handled be given a bonus at the expense of those who actually paid the tax, and who cannot be identified?

In another speech at St. Anthony, Idaho, on July 24, 1934, at a Mormon pioneer day celebration, as reported in the New York Times of July 25 of that year, the Senator is quoted as saying:

> Is there any livestock man, sheep or cattle raiser, who does not know that the meat packers are constantly manipulating the markets to his ruin? The packers, when they cannot pass the processing tax on to the consumer, pass it back in the way of lower prices to the producers.
> I was given a statement the other day by one of the packers; the profits of the last year were very great. I saw another letter from another packer sometime ago in which it was plainly stated that the packers were passing the processing tax back to the producer.

In his radio speech on March 22, as it appears at page 5219 of the RECORD, the Senator stated:

> No better illustration could be had as to the way in which the processing tax reaches the producer and by him must be paid than is found in the jute tax. This processing tax is not being paid by those who sell jute bags, but is being paid by the farmers.

Of course, that did not mean that the tax actually was not in the first instance paid by the handler, or processor. It meant that in the last analysis the consumer was required to pay it.

It would probably merely invite litigation to establish a rule of evidence authorizing the imposition of the burden of proof either on the Government or on the taxpayer. It is doubtful whether honestly that burden of proof could be discharged by either party. As a lawyer, I would not know how to prove my case for either.

Suppose I wished to maintain that the tax had been passed on to the consumer; I would probably be able to prove that the prices of the processor's product had been raised during a period, but he would probably be able to overcome that with proof that the motive for increasing the prices was something different, or at least he might be prompted to attempt to do so.

For the reason that if we embark upon the policy of refunding the processing taxes we will merely succeed in paying a bonus to someone who is not entitled to it, to someone who actually did not bear the tax, mulcting the Government in a very large aggregate sum, and for the other reasons I have stated I believe the committee amendment to be sound.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I think it would be a mistake to permit the argument made by the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to remain unchallenged, for those of us who are opposed to the pending amendment are not opposed upon any such grounds as those suggested by the Senator from Arkansas, as was made perfectly clear, it seems to me, by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] in his argument a little while ago with respect to the amendment.

The distinguished Senator from Idaho made it perfectly clear that he was as unwilling as any of us to have somebody recover money from the Federal Government who was not entitled to it. He made it perfectly clear, it seems to me, that the one objection he was making and insisting upon was that it was un-American and unjust to prevent persons from going into court when they had a claim against the Federal Government.

Let me see if I can state briefly what my understanding is of those who are urging this amendment. Hurriedly, in what was called "a great emergency", Congress passed the Agricultural Adjustment Act, permitting these processing taxes to be levied. It was done at a time when it was believed the farmers needed great help, when it was believed the country was in the throes of a great depression and needed all the assistance possible in every direction. So these taxes were imposed, and I assume it was true, in many instances I know it was true, that those who paid the taxes did not believe the Federal Government had the right to levy them in the particular way specified. But they were urged by propaganda and otherwise that the country was in a great depression, and that it was unpatriotic to do anything in opposition to this great scheme designed to take us out of the depression.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] pointed out that, in the first instance, a man could protect himself by refusing to pay the tax, compelling the Government to sue him for the tax, and thereby test the constitutionality of the act, and so on, giving no credit to the man who was trying to do a patriotic duty and follow the leadership of one who was attempting to take us out of the depression. I think it was to the credit of the citizen that he paid the tax voluntarily instead of being sued for it, and having the people all over the Nation call him up to the bar of justice and say, "You are doing something to prevent the country from coming out of the depression."

A citizen pays his tax to the Federal Government, and lo and behold, about this time, a year or two after the payment, the administration reaches the conclusion that there is a great possibility, a probability, a pretty nearly universal opinion, that the act will be declared unconstitutional; but the billion dollars or so which have been collected by the Federal Government must somehow be kept in the Treasury of the Federal Government, or at least the credit of the Federal Government must not be affected by the requirement to repay that money.

Is that a free government or not? Have we reached the point where we admit that through our patriotism, through our desire to help, we may pay a tax, and then find a little later that the act under which it was collected is declared to be unconstitutional, but the Congress has said, "You shall not be permitted to go into court"?

Go into court for what purpose? The distinguished Senator from Idaho has said that he has no idea of permitting anyone to recover any tax which he has not paid, meaning that which he has not ultimately paid. Of course, the processor himself has been taxed, and he has paid the tax, and it is true, I assume, that he has passed it on to the consumer. No more true is it that he has passed it on than that the corporation which paid an income tax has passed it on. They all pass it on if they possibly can. But merely because they pass it on does not mean that we should deny a man the right to go into court and find out whether or not his rights have been taken away from him.

What is the danger in permitting a taxpayer to go into court? The distinguished Senator from Arkansas says, "If you permit him to go into court, you permit him to collect a tax which has been passed on to the consumer, and that would be unfair."

It is perfectly ridiculous to say that we cannot safeguard that sort of a situation. It is perfectly absurd to say that we must deny citizens all rights merely because they have passed the tax on. Of course, the individual who has paid the tax by having it passed on to him cannot come back on the Federal Government under any circumstances, because it is only the person against whom the tax is laid who ought to have any right to sue the Government of the United States. The Senator from Idaho is not so much interested, I take it, in securing to the taxpayer even the loss he has sustained as he is disturbed, as all of us ought to be disturbed, about taking away from him the right to have his case heard.

Mr. President, those of us who know anything about what the processor has gone through know that as a matter of fact the processor has been greatly damaged. I have in my possession a petition signed by 32 people, presented to me more than a year ago, declaring that if the processing tax continued it would be necessary for them to go out of business, and my understanding is that all but three or four of them have gone out of business because it was not possible for them to pass the tax on. I took that petition sent to me on May 7, 1934, and referred it to the Department of Agriculture. In the letter transmitting it to me, which I desire to read, will be found this language:

Last week was one of the outstanding weeks for the processing tax. Steers have been left alone by the Department and last week they sold for $9.50 per hundredweight in Chicago. That is the highest price they have brought in 2 years. We bought hogs in St. Joseph, Mo., at all-time low for $2.95 per hundredweight. The tax on the hogs will amount to almost as much as the hogs cost. Packers are simply afraid to buy these hogs as each month the tax is due. The tax for this little plant amounted to $30,000 last month. It is doing almost the impossible to take $30,000 cash out of any business.

We note there is another bill now coming up to make Secretary Wallace practically a dictator. If they pass this bill, it will be about time to shut up shop. All these small butchers around here had to stop long ago. A small packer in the lower part of Maryland owes the Department $10,000. He has had to stop doing business, and I suppose the Department will take his factory and machinery, because the man does not have the money and does not know where he can get $10,000.

I sent that letter to the Department of Agriculture. I received a reply, under date of May 12, which I desire the Senator from Idaho particularly to note. I read:

Your letter of May 4, conveying the protest of a group of dealers in pork products in Wilmington, Del., has been received. The Department is grateful for any information that bears on the operation of a processing tax.

As you are aware, changes in the rate of a processing tax are made according to the provisions of paragraph (b), section 9, of the Agricultural Adjustment Act. By the provisions of this paragraph the Department is required to act according to a formula in which the effects of the tax on the consumption of the commodity, the accumulation of surplus stocks, and the farm price of the commodity are all examined.

In weighing this protest, we believe that these dealers should consider carefully whether or not other factors than the processing tax are responsible for the plight in which they now find themselves. Eastern packers in general do not accumulate stocks of pork to any appreciable degree. Middle-western packers do accumulate such stocks. Is it not, therefore, possible that the difficulties of the eastern packers may be due to the competition of stored stocks that are now being disposed of by the large middle-western packers? Some specialists in the Department believe this to be the case.

I replied to that letter, as follows:

I note in your letter that you ask the following question: "Is it not, therefore, possible that the difficulties of the eastern packers may be due to the competition of stored stocks that are now being disposed of by the large middle-western packers?"

I cannot answer that important question; but, if it be true, as some of your specialists in the Department believe to be the case, how does that help those distressed packers in my State? It is the same old story—when you adopt a course of legislation for the relief of a particular class you impose more than a corresponding burden upon some other class.

Mr. President, as late as July 2, I had a letter from the Wilmington Provision Co., of Wilmington, Del., a small packer, in which it was said:

Our business in Delaware has been very seriously affected by the hog tax of $2.25 per hundredweight. This tax has cost us a loss during the past year or more and these losses are increasing each month, and if they continue it will simply mean the closing of this plant.

* * * * * * *

We cannot understand how Mr. Wallace or those in charge of this hog tax can attempt to continue this tax and then put through amendments that are positively putting us, as well as most every other independent packer in the country, out of business. We are the distributors of the hogs from the farms, and if all the little packers are put out of business it should be plain enough to anyone that the price of livestock will have to fall, which in turn will mean less competition for the hogs and a sharp drop in values.

On May 28 of this year I received the following letter from the Beste Provision Co., of Wilmington, Del.:

Since the fall of 1933 when the processing tax was levied on packers and processors we have paid the collector of internal revenue $54,981.23 processing tax. Beginning with the period in which the tax was levied, we began losing money and our losses are getting larger each month, because at times during this period we are unable to sell our products when this tax was added.

Our customers simply would not buy and we were forced to reduce our price on all perishable products and take a loss. Our books are open for inspection to verify this statement.

There are rumors that some of the larger packers are not paying this tax but are allowing it to accumulate. There are also rumors to the effect that a $505,000 processing-tax account was settled for $127,000 at Newark, N. J., and another tax account of $80,000 was settled in Baltimore, Md., for $14,000.

I wish to say in that connection, that I made inquiry about the $505,000 item and the $80,000 item, and I was informed by the Department that the information the writer of the letter gave was correct, but these companies had gone into bankruptcy, and the Federal Government was taking out of them all it could get, which was the reason it made that settlement.

Mr. President, I call attention to the facts contained in those letters for two purposes. One is to show a thing which the Secretary of Agriculture knows to be true, that it is not possible for the processors to pass all of the processing tax on. The difficulty here and the great fear is that if we give the processors the opportunity to sue for the damages they have actually sustained under a law which they believe now to be unconstitutional, it will require the Federal Government to put up a considerable sum of money to reimburse them for such damages.

I am not anxious to take anything from the Federal Treasury for any purpose which is not essential, but I insist that if the Federal Government has invaded the right of any man and has caused him to suffer a damage it has done something which it has no right under our form of government to do, and Congress ought to be ashamed of itself if it were to take away from him the right to sue in the courts of this land to recover from the Federal Government what is actually due.

The fact that this tax was imposed for a specific purpose—the one thing which, in my judgment, makes it unconstitutional—does not relieve the Federal Government at all. It was imposed upon the theory that it was to be used for a public purpose. If it was used for a public purpose, then we can go into the Treasury of the United States and take the public money and return it to the person who has been damaged by an act passed by the Congress which was unconstitutional, under which was collected a tax which the Government had no right to collect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POPE in the chair). The time of the Senator from Delaware has expired.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I have been very deeply moved by this proposal, and am very much concerned about it. The proposal is to exercise the arbitrary power——

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. CONNALLY. I desire to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] is detained from the Senate by important business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Ninety-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. BAILEY. I was saying, Mr. President, that I am very deeply interested in the pending amendment and have been profoundly moved by the discussion of it.

I believe I can approach just what I wish to say by relating an historical incident, a story of Frederick the Great. When he came to set apart certain lands at Potsdam for his great palace and estate, he sent forth his agents to buy up the land or to take it by the power of tyranny and oppression. The agents became involved in a controversy with a little miller down by a stream, who resisted the officers of the great King. He resisted them all the way up to the throne. When he came before the throne, Frederick the Great said to his agents, "Let the miller keep his mill, in order that it may be known that there is law in Prussia."

So I say, Mr. President, let the American citizen keep his rights to test out the laws of the United States in order that it may be known that there is law in the United States. If the tyrant Frederick the Great could stay the hand of his bureaucratic servants, notwithstanding they were operating in behalf of the acquisition of his palatial grounds, in order that the humble miller might have his mill and that the people ruled by Frederick, with a power far more absolute than any power this Government has ever had or ever will have, might know that law prevailed in Prussia; if that could be the rule decades back in Prussia, I think it very strange that here in this land of liberty and of individual rights the Congress, representing the people of the United States, should be proposing to do that which is proposed in the language which I intend to read, assuming, of course, that every Senator is familiar with it, but considering that it ought to be read over and over again, as follows:

> No Federal or State court shall have jurisdiction to entertain a suit or proceeding against the United States or any collector of internal revenue or other internal-revenue officer or any person who has been such a collector or officer or the personal representative of any such collector, officer, or person (nor shall any such suit or proceeding be brought or maintained in, nor shall any judgment or decree be entered by, any such court) (1) for the recoupment, set-off, recovery, refund, or credit of, or on any counterclaim for, any amount of any tax, interest, or penalty, assessed, paid, collected, or accrued under this title prior to the date of the adoption of this amendment or (2) for damages for the collection thereof.

Mr. President, I am inclined to take the view that we do not have the power under the Constitution to enact such a law as this. We may pass such a statute, but I do not think it will ever be law in America. Assuming, however, that we do have the power, my mind recurs to a line I learned long years ago—

> O it is excellent
> To have a giant's strength; but it is tyrannous
> To use it like a giant.

There is a controversy here about the passing on of the taxes. The argument of my distinguished and very warmly loved friend, our leader here, seems to revolve around the theory that these taxes either were passed on or the question was one so difficult of solution that we would be justified in enacting this arbitrary statute, denying, in a truly tyrannical way, the right of an American citizen to recover against the Government either a tax or a penalty which presumably had been wrongfully taken from him.

Agreeing in the first instance that it was in contemplation that these taxes should be passed on, and agreeing in the second instance that just to what extent they were passed on and whether one litigant passed them on and another did not, is a question, I submit that it is a question not for the arbitrary exercise of our power but for the exercise of justice in the court created by the Constitution and not by the Congress. We are not the judges of that question. We can enact the statute, but we are not the judges of the effect and the consequences of the statute or the rights under the statute.

In the second place, I do not hesitate to assert as a fact, and I could put it in evidence here if the facts were to be tried, that these taxes have not been passed on in all cases. There are 65 cotton mills and knitting mills in my State of North Carolina which are now closed down. Around those silent, closed factories are 35,000 human beings who have no means of livelihood, so long as those factories are closed down, other than the work relief or the other relief provided by the Federal Government. In those 65 cotton mills and knitting mills are goods piled on the shelves unsold. The taxes are collected in the case of the cotton mill at what we call the breaker. That is where the cotton begins to enter into the process of manufacture. The tax has been assessed. In many cases the tax has been paid. But the goods have not been sold. The taxes on those mills have not been passed on, and those are 65 instances in one Commonwealth.

How far that condition prevails I do not know, but I have this to say. Conceding everything the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] said, so long as there is one individual in our land deprived of his property in the form of taxes or penalties under the operation of an act of Congress, it is tyrannical and it is immoral—immoral, I repeat—to seek to deprive him of his rights simply because we think we have the power to do it.

It has not been long since the Supreme Court of the United States made something in the nature of a suggestion as to the conscience of the sovereign in America, and to that I refer for evidence, that there is such a thing yet remaining in our land as "the conscience of the sovereign." There is a moral tribunal in which it is the duty of every man who recognizes the grandeur of the moral law to resolve this question, in which it is the duty of every government that professes to be a government and which would have the approval of the people whom it serves and the God from which it came, for the powers that be are ordained of God, to resolve its questions not only in terms of justice, but in terms of morals. When we fail to satisfy the moral standard of righteousness in the high places we may not expect anything but the lower order of life amongst the people for whom we undertake to set the great example and the symbols of the Government.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I should like to have the opinion of the Senator from North Carolina, and I trust the able Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] will hear my views. Having in mind the law which allows the Court of Claims to take jurisdiction of a claim by a citizen, after having it brought to Congress and heard in Congress, reaching to the point of passing an act of Congress, do the able Senators feel that this act, which forbids suits in the Federal courts as suits against the Government, prevents the exercise of the law which allows recovery in the Court of Claims?

Mr. BAILEY. The term "Federal court" embraces the Court of Claims.

Mr. LEWIS. I am carrying in my mind the thought that we are all busy lawyers, that the distinction is made that the Court of Claims is not a constitutional but a statutory court, and I inquire whether or not this bill as it now stands—and I am frankly seeking for information—still authorizes a proceeding by those, as described by the able Senator from North Carolina, who may have paid their taxes and feel them to have been wrongfully collected and whether they may not still bring a proceeding in the form of a bill before the Congress, secure a congressional act, and then to the Court of Claims to collect it, or from the Court of Claims obtain a judgment and from there to the Congress to obtain an appropriation. I inquire if my friend feels this bill deprives the citizen he has described, who has paid the taxes, of his recourse to the Court of Claims for such redress as the Court of Claims has been constituted to grant?

Mr. BAILEY. I have not the slightest doubt about it. That is the intention of the act. The intention of the act is, 2 years and some months since its enactment, to prevent any citizen who has paid taxes under the act or paid penalty under the act from testing the power of the Government to collect the tax or the penalty; and, further, to prevent the citizen under any circumstances, whether by recoupment, set-off, recovery, refund, credit, or counterclaim, to obtain the return of a dollar he has paid. Unconstitutional or constitutional, lawful or unlawful—

Let him take who has the power,
And let him keep who can.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. Does the Senator recognize any distinction, so far as the equal treatment of our citizens is concerned, between those who have already paid a tax and those who will be required to pay the tax after the enactment of this particular bill?

Mr. BAILEY. None whatever. So far as I am concerned, Mr. President, I wish to make this perfectly clear: I shall never live long enough, though I live a million years, to exercise the power which I have here as a trustee of the people—and that is all the power I have, the power of a trustee under the Constitution—to deprive an individual in this land of his right to recover any money unlawfully paid or any property unlawfully taken, or his right to test the constitutionality of any law which is imposed upon him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. BAILEY. I will take my time on the bill. I have not finished.

Mr. WAGNER. And yet the very bill we are considering, for a reason which I cannot fathom, makes a distinction between the taxpayer who has already paid the tax and the future taxpayer. In the case of the one who has already paid the tax it shuts the door of a court of justice to him altogether; while, as to the future taxpayer, the Government assents to his going into court and recovering the tax, so long as he proves that he has not passed it on. I do not know why one taxpayer should be treated unjustly and the other justly.

Mr. BAILEY. One is in the past, and the other is in the future. That is the idea.

Mr. President, that may raise a question of some interest to us all. I said here about 2 days ago that I had applied myself with all earnestness to the study of this measure. I had found it extremely involved and intricate and so difficult to understand that I wondered how far the fault was within myself, until I talked to my fellow Senators and found all of them were having the same difficulty. What the Senator from New York has said brings up the question, In whose fertile brain did the conception arise that we should have one law as to the destruction of rights with regard to the old act, and a different one with regard to the new act?

That being the fact, who can deny that if the measure we now propose to pass should go into force, and the taxes be collected unter it, 1 year from now or 2 years from now, suits being entered, and the constitutional question being in the balance—as we all know it is—we should be called upon to pass an act similar to this? I do not think there would be any difficulty about that. Promptly we should, with respect to the then pending litigation, invoke the amendment now before us with respect to the pending bill; the plain purpose and intent being to collect the man's taxes, and to place penalties upon him for not paying the taxes—and they are very heavy penalties—and then say to him, "It is useless for you to appeal to your Government for justice."

This Government has three branches. One is the executive, one is the legislative, and the other is the judicial. One is administration, one is law, the other is justice—in terms of the rights of the individual.

Mr. SMITH. The Senator means that is our theory.

Mr. BAILEY. That is our theory, and that is always going to be our principle. I am not doubtful about that. The rights of individual liberty will not be extinguished in this land.

Mr. President, a great deal has been said here about the origin of this doctrine of the immunity of the sovereign from suit. That was, from its inception, the doctrine of tyrants, and in its very character it is tyrannical. We may invoke it in the name of a free republic, if we please, and we may apply it as representatives of the people, if we please. Nevertheless, when all is said and done, it is precisely the same tyranny which was exercised by the tyrants from whose foul breasts this doctrine arose, and it contains within it the same power of oppression that they exercised by means of it.

The fathers who founded this country were done with kings. They were done with governments for the few. They were done with arbitrariness. They dedicated this Government to liberty—liberty defined in the terms of personal, individual rights. This is a government of laws and not of men; and the doctrine of the immunity of the sovereign from question by his subjects established the doctrine of government by men and not of laws, government by kings and aristocracies and not by the people, government affirming the supreme character of the state and denying the sovereignty of the people. We have lived so long in this Republic, we have gotten so far away from the great ideals that governed the men who made it what it is—I shall not call all their names—that we have lost the sense of the values they established, and we have an idealism which is like the pale light of the moon compared with the bright sun in comparison with the idealism of Washington and Jefferson and Adams and Marshall and Madison and Hamilton and Mason, and all the other noble founders of our Republic.

Mr. President, I stand and make a plea at this hour for the idealism in which this country was born, in which this Republic was created, in which the character of this Government was molded. I will match that idealism against all the moonshine of the modern socialistic so-called "liberal" who breathes in every word he utters the words of reaction, and then complains of men like ourselves as being reactionaries.

The doctrine of the immunity of the sovereign or the state from question—that is what it is; it is not merely immunity from suit, it is immunity from question—is precisely the same order of thinking now proceeding in our land that created the communism in Russia and the fascism in Italy. Of course, I speak respectfully of all foreign countries. What did they do? What is the heart of it? Mussolini says, "Away with liberty! Away with individual rights! The state is supreme." This amendment says the same thing.

What is the standard in Russia? I make no complaint about their communism. They have a perfect right to their form of government. I am speaking of the theory of the root of it. The root of it is that all is for the state, and the state is supreme, and the individual is nothing.

Mr. President, I beg my fellow Senators, regardless of party, to join with me in repudiating this amendment, not because it affects a few taxpayers, not because it relates to a cotton mill here or some other kind of mill somewhere else, but because this amendment strikes down the soul of the American Republic, compromises us in our own eyes, and presents us defenseless before the bar of the moral law.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed, without amendment, the following bills of the Senate:

S. 1309. An act to amend section 114 of the Judicial Code to provide for terms of District Court for the Western District of Wisconsin to be held at Wausau, Wis., and for other purposes;

S. 2326. An act authorizing the Secretary of War to sell to the Eagle Pass & Piedras Negras Bridge Co. a portion of the Eagle Pass Military Reservation, Tex., and for other purposes; and

S. 2965. An act to amend the Hawaiian Homes Commission Act of 1920.

The message also announced that the House further insisted upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 17, 67, 68, 83, and 84 to the bill (H. R. 7260) to provide for the general welfare by establishing a system of Federal old-age benefits, and by enabling the several States to make more adequate provision for aged persons, dependent and crippled children, maternal and child welfare, public health, and the administration of their unemployment compensation laws; to establish a Social Security Board; to raise revenue; and for other purposes; agreed to the further conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and Mr. DOUGHTON, Mr. SAM B. HILL, Mr. CULLEN, Mr. TREADWAY, and Mr. BACHARACH were appointed managers on the part of the House at the further conference.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (S. 2532) to amend an act entitled "An act setting aside Rice Lake and contiguous lands in Minnesota for the exclusive use and benefit of the Chippewa Indians of Minnesota", approved June 23, 1926, and for other purposes, and it was signed by the Vice President.

AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ADMINISTRATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8492) to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the discussion in the Senate this afternoon pertaining to the right of a citizen to sue his Government. It has been stated that the existing practice comes from the ancient idea of the days of barbarism, when it was said that the king could do no wrong, and that, it is claimed, is the reason why governments do not allow themselves ordinarily to be sued.

In my opinion, the freedom of a government like ours, for instance, from suits begun by its citizens without its consent rests upon an entirely different ground. As I see it, the immunity of the Government from suits by the citizen rests on the fundamental idea of self-preservation.

Deductions could very well be made from some of the arguments which have been presented that a government which will not permit itself to be sued at any time, on any occasion, by anybody who wishes to sue it, is despotic, and that it lacks the fundamental principle of liberty and freedom.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is it not true that virtually every State of the Union has a similar law on its statute books?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly; every government in the civilized world has a similar law.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is my recollection; but I am quite sure that practically all the States of the Union have laws under which they do not allow themselves to be sued.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. It is true that the States have such a rule, but a number of governments do not have that rule.

Mr. NORRIS. A government which does not have that rule must circumscribe the right very completely, must control by some rule or law the right to sue the government, and not have such universal right extended to everybody, or it could not live.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BAILEY. I suggest to the Senator very respectfully that the question here is not a matter of universal suits.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that, and I intend to offer an amendment before I conclude which, as I see it, will clear up this difficulty. I do not deny the justice of the position taken by Senators as to the right of a citizen to begin an action where he has not passed on the tax which he has paid to the Government.

Mr. BAILEY. This is a question of a right to test a statute in the courts. In the first place, there is an affirmative act of the Government by way of legislation, and, in the second place, there is a test of the right of the Government under the statute to take taxes and benefits without recourse. That is the question involved here.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, my reference to the argument which has been made was for the purpose of calling to the attention of the Senate what I believe to be a reasonable view, so that Senators will not go off on a tangent and say, "We must repudiate, we must vote down any proposition which limits the right of a citizen to sue the Government."

If there were no limitation on the right of a citizen to commence a suit against the Government, if the courts were open to suits by citizens against the Government as they are open to suits between citizens, I do not see how the Government could exist. I do not believe it could. I think the reason for the rule is not the ancient one, that the king can do no wrong, but in modern times at least it is the rule of self-preservation.

I do not believe the Government ought to refuse to allow itself to be sued under any circumstances. There are many avenues in which we have recognized the right of the individual to sue and to recover money wrongfully obtained by the Government. I am in full sympathy with that, and I believe that in this particular case, instead of deciding the matter on the abstract question of the right of the citizen to sue the Government, we ought to meet the conditions confronting us, and grant such modified right as will prevent injustice, and will give every person who has a legal and a rightful claim a day in court to present his claim and be heard.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. I was wondering how the citizen would know he had a right to make a claim if we did not permit him to go into court. That is the very question here.

Mr. NORRIS. I would permit him to go into court under the amendment I intend to offer before I conclude. I shall offer an amendment which will give the citizen the right to do that if he can go in with clean hands.

Mr. ADAMS. May I ask the Senator what would be the type of injury or oppression to the citizen for the redress of which the Senator thinks he ought not to be permitted to go into court?

Mr. NORRIS. I did not understand the Senator's question.

Mr. ADAMS. I was wondering in what type of cases or instances the Senator thinks the citizen should be denied the right to sue the State.

Mr. NORRIS. It is going to appear, when I offer the amendment, just what persons I would allow to sue. I am opposed to throwing down the bars and saying to everybody, "You can sue the Government", because there probably would be millions of suits. It would be profitable to a class of attorneys to bring such suits by the thousands, and if we did such a thing as that I do not believe our Government would last 5 years from the date we allowed it.

Mr. ADAMS. Is not the Senator rather abandoning his usual confidence in the citizenship of the country when he states that he believes that that would be the result of throwing down the bars?

Mr. NORRIS. No. I can cite cases of some instrumentalities of the Government which are thrown open to suit without any limitation—instrumentalities of Government which are being killed by suits brought and lost, yet the losing party makes money. I can give the Senator actual illustrations where millions are involved.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. As an illustration, there are 350,000 Indians, the wards of our Government, and we have by law allowed a number of those Indians to bring suit. Three billion dollars of claims have been filed against the Government of the United States by the Indians, and they comprise but 350,000 of our citizens.

Mr. NORRIS. That would not be a drop in the bucket. We passed a law about 3 years ago providing for the T. V. A. organization. They organized, and they were met with an injunction where they had an agreement with 14 or 20 municipalities to supply them with electricity, cities and villages which were paying enormous prices for electricity, buying it from the Alabama Power Co. The T. V. A. made contracts, agreed to by the municipalities, agreed to by the owners of the distributing system, agreed to by the T. V. A., for very greatly reduced rates. The T. V. A. had the power going to waste over Wilson Dam, and they made a contract to sell it. But a court issued an injunction which restrained them from selling it, restrained the municipalities from buying it, and the power continues to go to waste; the people continue to pay high rates; the people lose all the money that would have been received for the power that is gone and lost forever; the municipalities have lost millions in additional rates they have had to pay; and if they win the suit in the end, yet they lose millions by it.

It happens, incidentally, that the corporation which gets the benefit of this loss is the Alabama Power Co. It is profitable to them to litigate. It pays them well to do it. The T. V. A. is an instrumentality of the Government of the United States. This is only an illustration where millions of dollars have been lost by the citizens on the one side and the T. V. A. on the other, millions of dollars totally lost, without a possibility of recovery; yet the citizens have won the suit.

Mr. ADAMS. Is not the fault rather with our judicial processes than with the fact that we open the courts to citizens?

Mr. NORRIS. There is an instance of where we let the Government be sued without limitation. I am not trying to change that. I advocated the law when it was passed. But it shows the difficulty the Government would get into if it permitted suits to be brought indiscriminately, without limit against it.

Mr. President, I sympathize entirely with a corporation or an individual who pays a processing tax and has not passed it on, and then finds that it is declared to be illegal, let us say. Such a taxpayer ought to be allowed to recover. But, according to the argument made by the Senator from Delaware just a few moments ago, if we do not limit this right to recovery, there may be a liability on the part of the Government to suits for the recovery of about $2,000,000,000, I understand, which corporations and individuals have paid in the way of processing taxes, which have been passed on to the consumer. The corporations upon which the tax was levied have been repaid by the consumers, and to permit such corporations now to come to the Government and get the money again would be an outrage.

Mr. President, I desire now to offer the amendment to which I have referred.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. Does the Senator believe that the court would sustain an action by one who had paid the processing tax but in fact had recouped it?

Mr. NORRIS. The argument is made that that is just what they would do. I do not know whether or not the court would sustain such an action.

Mr. ADAMS. I call the Senator's attention to the recent Supreme Court opinion on the gold clause in Government bonds. In that case the Supreme Court of the United States said that the holder of gold-clause bonds had a perfectly good contract, but unless he could show that he was personally damaged he could not recover, and in the gold-clause cases the Court said the economic situation surrounding the condition at the time the claimant made his demand should be taken into consideration.

Mr. GLASS rose.

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. I rise merely to express my satisfaction at hearing it so repeatedly stated on the floor today that the processing taxes have been passed on to the consumers.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think they have all been passed on.

Mr. GLASS. I express my satisfaction because when the bill was under consideration, and some of us objected to it upon the ground that the processing taxes would be passed on to the consumers, as I recall, the Secretary of Agriculture vehemently denied that any such thing was in contemplation or that any such thing was possible; yet that is just exactly what has been done. No one speaks for the consumer at all.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no doubt that the processing taxes were passed on. I think they always have been passed on, except in cases such as the Senator from North Carolina mentions—and I think there are a good many such cases—where a man has paid a processing tax, as the Senator describes, and the goods are unsold and on the shelf. If the processing tax is held to be illegal, I think in such cases the man ought to have returned to him the money which he paid as a processing tax. That is only fair. If I could, I would compel the Government of the United States to return that money; and I think my amendment will do it, as I see it.

On page 58, line 15, after the first word in the line, the word "amendment", I propose to insert "unless the claimant in the action shall allege and prove that the amount sought to be recovered has not been passed on to any subsequent purchaser."

I offer that amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. MURPHY. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. NORRIS. I intend now to yield the floor.

Mr. MURPHY. I desire to ask the Senator a question in connection with the amendment. The Senator's amendment assumes the passing on of the tax to a consumer?

Mr. NORRIS. No; to a purchaser. I do not use the word "consumer."

Mr. MURPHY. My question is purely for information. Is the Senator from Nebraska satisfied that his amendment would cover the case of a processor who collected the tax from the producer in the form of a lower price paid to the producer for his commodity?

Let me illustrate what I mean: When the processing tax was imposed on hogs, on the very date the processing tax took effect the price of hogs was lowered by exactly the amount of the tax. Does the Senator consider that his amendment covers such situations as that?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think it would have any application to that situation. It would have no application in any case unless a processing tax had actually been paid and not passed on.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, may we have the amendment read?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In the committee amendment, on page 58, line 15, after the word "amendment", it is proposed to insert "unless the claimant in the action shall allege and prove that the amount sought to be recovered has not been passed on to any subsequent purchaser."

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I was just about to call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska to the fact that the wording of his amendment ought to be such as to provide for the case where the tax had already been collected by virtue of lowering the price of the commodity the processor bought. The language of the amendment restricts it to the subsequent sale of the product. I desired to call the Senator's attention to that in order that he might modify his amendment so as to make it mandatory upon the claimant to prove that he had not collected the tax either from the consumer or from the one from whom he purchased the raw material.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska undoubtedly helps this provision very much. The same purpose he has in mind might well be accomplished by simply providing that the language on page 61 shall read:

> No recovery, refund, or credit shall be made or allowed of any amount of any tax which accrued before or on or after the date of the adoption of this amendment—

Except upon the conditions subsequently stated in the amendment. That language covers all the cases which the Senator from South Carolina has in mind.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, I think that will also cover the point which I made.

Mr. GEORGE. Undoubtedly it will cover the very point which the Senator from Iowa made.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I have had called to my attention just now by one of the experts the fact that the same object could be accomplished by making a very slight change on page 61.

Mr. GEORGE. That is what I just called attention to.

Mr. NORRIS. Is that what the proposed change is?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not hear the Senator. I was talking just then with the expert.

Mr. GEORGE. I called attention to the fact that the same purpose could be accomplished by inserting certain language on page 61, line 16, so as to read "tax which accrued before or on or after the date of the adoption", and so forth.

Mr. NORRIS. By inserting the words "before or."

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; just inserting the words "before or."

Mr. NORRIS. That might accomplish what we wish to accomplish by the amendment.

Mr. President, on account of the importance of this matter, and the suggestions that are made, and, in view of the fact that we cannot finish the bill today, I am wondering whether it would not be well to go on with other amendments, and take up this amendment later—tomorrow, perhaps. What does the Senator from Georgia think of that suggestion?

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I was about to make the suggestion—in fact, I had made the suggestion—that the amendment I propose might be inserted on page 61, which, so far as I now can see, would cover the situation. Certainly the additional words would be useful there.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, then the amendment on page 58 would have to go out.

Mr. GEORGE. Then the entire amendment on page 58 should go out, save as to certain exceptions made on page 58.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me we ought to pass over the amendment on page 58 until we take up the subsequent amendment on page 61, and see whether that can be agreed to in such form as to meet the difficulties suggested. Then we can go back and strike out the amendment on page 58 if necessary.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, having made the motion I am quite willing that the amendment shall go over until we may get together on it. So far as I see it, there is no difference in the position of the Senator from Nebraska and mine. It is only a question of arriving at the method of accomplishing the desired purpose. As I understand, the Senator from Nebraska concedes the right to sue, but he wants to control—and I think very properly—the matter of procedure; that is to say, where a person has not suffered any loss, of course he should not recover. I have favored that from the beginning.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. STEIWER. I merely desire to join in the suggestion made by the Senator from Nebraska. I think we are approaching what may be a solution of this matter, but, at first blush it occurs to me that we ought to give a little further thought to our method of procedure. It happens that on page 58 the provision is stated in terms of denial of jurisdiction of the court; and if that should go out the whole thing would stand on the negative effect of subsection (d) on page 61.

It may be that I am slow in comprehending the exact nature of the proposal made, but I should like a little more time to consider it. If that request may be granted it will be very welcome to some of us who are trying to follow this feature of the debate.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will read the provision on page 61 I think he will see that the recovery of credit, and so forth, may be allowed either by the collector of internal revenue or through court procedure. The dual rights of the taxpayers are recognized in that provision. It might be necessary to eliminate other language in the provision on page 61.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator further?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. STEIWER. Probably I did not make myself perfectly clear. One thing I had in mind was the language on page 59, which also denies the right to maintain certain kinds of proceedings. I am not yet sure whether the elimination of the language on page 58 will correct the situation if subsection (b) on page 59 shall be retained in the bill.

Mr. GEORGE. Subsection (b) is, of course, not now open to consideration, because it contains only two or three slight committee amendments at the end of the subsection. I think, however, that subsection (b) refers only to equity proceedings, extraordinary remedies, such as injunctions. I do not think it cuts off the right of refund.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that the amendment on page 61 was adopted on July 10.

Mr. GEORGE. That being the case, unless we could have unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which that amendment was agreed to, we would, of course, have to resort to an amendment on page 58.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. In the hope of expediting consideration, if the Senator from Georgia and other Senators who have discussed this matter, including the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], who has offered an amendment, are agreeable to the suggestion, we might temporarily pass over this amendment and allow them to get together and frame such amendment as they think will cover the situation of those who have already passed the tax on after it has been collected.

Mr. GEORGE. It will be necessary that consent be given to reconsider the vote by which the amendment on page 61 was agreed to, the Chair advising that it has heretofore been agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. So that there may be no misunderstanding, I wish to say that I myself am not going to agree to the proposed amendment. I want to insist upon the principles declared by the sections as reported by the committee. So we will have no unanimous-consent agreement about it.

Mr. BORAH. I did not understand what the Senator from Alabama said.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I said, so that the matter may not be passed over under a misapprehension that we were about to reach a unanimous-consent agreement involving the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], I thought it proper to say that I would not be in line with that thought and would not acquiesce in a program along that line. I have no objection if the Senate wishes to pass over the amendment; but, from my standpoint, I do not consent, and will not consent, to conforming the section on page 58, involving taxes heretofore paid, with the subsequent section relating to taxes hereafter to be paid.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CLARK. Is it necessary to have unanimous consent to enable the Senate to insert in this bill the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska or any other amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not at all; but the amendment to the section on page 61 has been adopted.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Of course, it is not necessary, but we are talking about passing over the amendment and working out an agreement on it. I wanted to state my position so that there would be no misunderstanding.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Alabama makes it perfectly plain that he will not accept the amendment, why not proceed with the amendment pending and vote on it? Why not go right ahead with the proposition, if there is no possibility of an agreement subsequently in reference to the amendment?

Mr. GEORGE. I understand the Senator from Alabama to object to a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment on page 61 inserting subsection (d) was agreed to on July 10.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I gave notice that I was not in line with the thought here upon the floor of the Senate of abandoning the amendment of the committee on page 58. I have no objection to any orderly procedure upon the proposition. In taking that position I do so because I do not want the amendment to go over under the idea that it would be worked out under an agreement and settled by abandoning the provision on page 58.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia allow me to make a short statement of less than a minute?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH. The provision on page 58 pertains entirely to taxes already levied and collected; the provision on page 61 has reference to those that are subsequently to be levied and collected. The Senator from Nebraska has offered an amendment in reference to the paragraph which pertains to the taxes already collected. As there has been an amendment offered thereto looking toward liberalizing it to some extent, it was suggested by the Senator from Idaho that both features might be combined in one; that is, preserving whatever is deemed advisable in the provision on page 58 and also in the provision which occurs on page 61. I made the suggestion which I did in the interest of clarity and expedition, that the Senators interested get together, but it was not with the intent of abandoning any of the principles incorporated in either provision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Carolina that the amendment be temporarily laid aside?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. GORE. I will not ask the Senator to yield now, as I wish to speak in my own right.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, if the amendment is to be temporarily laid aside, I will reserve what I had expected to say on the general principles.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield ?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the amendment is to be temporarily laid aside, then subsection (d) ought to be reconsidered, so that both provisions may be considered; and I ask unanimous consent that——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is one request pending. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. McKELLAR. What I want to do is to ask for reconsideration of the vote by which subsection (d) was agreed to, if the Senator from Georgia will permit me.

Mr. GEORGE. On what page is that?

Mr. McKELLAR. Subsection (d) on page 61.

Mr. GEORGE. I had already submitted a similar request.

Mr. McKELLAR. Was it objected to?

Mr. GEORGE. I understood that it was objected to by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I may have misunderstood the provision to which the Senator from Georgia referred. I simply did not want to agree to anything that would result in abandoning the principle set forth in the committee proposal. I had reference also to the principle involved in the provision on page 58.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama speak so that we may hear him, please?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am trying to find out the basis of the request for reconsideration of subsection (d).

Mr. NORRIS. Has the Senator succeeded in finding out?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have not.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, may I make a statement?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. If those who are interested—and we all are agreed, I think, or, at least, a majority of the Senate are agreed, that some modification of the amendment on page 58 ought to be made—if Senators who have been discussing the matter can work out a plan by which the purpose of both amendments may be effectuated, it does not bind anybody here to agree to what they bring back, but it may solve the problem. Then we could reconsider the action on paragraph (d) if they should bring in a provision which would appeal to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Carolina temporarily to lay aside the amendment on page 58?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield. I was simply awaiting the order of the Chair as to whether or not the amendment is laid aside.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I wish to make a statement on that.

Mr. GEORGE. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I hope the request of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] will be agreed to. I am glad to see this question making some progress toward a composition. I do not believe that the provision of the bill now under discussion should be enacted into law as it now stands. I think some change should be made that would make it more just and reasonable in its purport and in its object and in its probable effect. Looking to that end, I myself have prepared an amendment which I will ask to have read, in order that it may be considered by those who are working out the composition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 59, line 5, it is proposed to strike out the period and insert in lieu thereof a comma and the words " or any taxpayer who alleges under oath or affirmation that he has sustained actual damage or loss."

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, in preparing this amendment I have followed the language used by the Supreme Court of the United States in the gold-clause cases. The Court held that, while the act annulling the gold clause in United States bonds was void, a holder of such bonds or other securities had a claim against the Government but that in most cases he had not suffered actual loss or damage, indicating that only in cases where there had been an actual loss could an aggrieved citizen recover. In the amendment I have adopted the language used by the Supreme Court in that decision. The amendment was prepared, I may say, with the assistance of the legislative draftsmen.

Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but for a moment, and I shall not embark on the discussion of theoretical questions as to the immunity of a sovereign from suit at the hands of a citizen. Whatever the origin of that doctrine, it is now a principle well established and accepted in our jurisprudence that the sovereign cannot be sued without its consent. It is equally well established, of course, that the sovereign may waive that immunity, and on many occasions it has waived the immunity and has permitted an aggrieved citizen to bring suit against the sovereign. From my present standpoint, the origin of this doctrine of immunity is immaterial. It may have had its origin in the ancient and now exploded doctrine that the king can do no wrong, a doctrine that has passed into the debris of history.

This is a Republic where the people are sovereign. But, sir, that does not affect this principle. It has been argued here that the processing tax has been shifted by the taxpayer, in some instances shifted backward to the vendor from whom the taxpayer purchased, in some instances shifted forward to the vendee to whom he has sold his commodity. Undoubtedly that was the theory upon which this entire processing tax was imposed, that the tax would be shifted by the processor, that it would be shifted, I assume, forward to the vendee and not backward to the vendor. I assume that no one in the beginning expected that the tax would be assumed, borne, and paid finally by the processor himself.

Undoubtedly in many cases the tax has been shifted. Undoubtedly in respect to the hog tax it was shifted back to the producer, shifted back to the farmer. I have made some investigation upon that point, and the conclusion is irresistible that in the earlier stages of the policy the processor shifted the tax back and made the producer of the hogs pay the tax. The total number of hog processors in the country has been about 18,000, while there have been some 12,000 corn processors and some 5,000 flour mills and 6,000 tobacco processors. These have all paid processing taxes. I do not have for the moment the number of cotton processors.

Undoubtedly in many instances the tax has been shifted forward. I believe the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] virtually contended that shifting of the tax was practically universal. If that be true, then it makes my amendment all the more easy to adopt, because if the processor has suffered no actual loss, if he has shifted the tax in every instance, then he has sustained no actual damage and no actual loss. It is a splendid opportunity where we can be honest and safe at one and the same time. We can save our faces and save our purses, and yet seem to be perfectly fair in the premises.

I have no doubt there are instances where the tax has not been shifted, where it has been borne by the processor, where it has been paid and borne by the taxpayer. I read an instance a few days ago of a tobacco concern in New York who had paid a processing tax amounting to more than $200,000 and the tax exceeded the entire amount of its sales. In that case, whatever may happen in the future, at least up to date that concern has not shifted the tax. The probabilities are it will never be able to shift the tax entirely. The newspaper report indicated the concern was teetering on the brink of bankruptcy. In such a case there would be an actual loss sustained at the hands of the Government, the Government obligated to protect the citizen instead of ruining him.

I remember the case of one of the great cotton mills in New Hampshire, the Amoskeag mills. Last year its annual report showed that it had suffered a loss of more than $1,000,000, I believe $1,008,000. I speak from memory. It had paid a processing tax of $1,274,000 and had paid extra wages on account of the code amounting to $1,600,000. Those were expenses incurred at the command of its Government. It seems to me fairly clear that in that case the taxpayer had not been able to pass the tax on either forward or backward, but that it had suffered a loss, had sustained an actual damage in the transaction.

If the privilege had never been granted to taxpayers to bring suit, I should not insist so strenuously that the doors of the courts be opened; but, Mr. President, these taxpayers have enjoyed this right, a statutory privilege which has been vouchsafed to them by the Government.

The Government has imposed this tax. The inferior courts have adjudged the tax to be unconstitutional. I think no lawyer doubts that the Supreme Court will hold the taxes are unconstitutional; that the Government of the United States, great sovereign as it is and as we have boasted this afternoon, has thrust its hands into the pockets of the taxpayers, some of them distressed taxpayers, has taken their money without their consent. And now, sir, since the courts have declared the tax to be unconstitutional and void, the great Government of the United States says, "We will close the doors of the courts and we will not return a tax that was void"; but that this great sovereign, invested with the power of taxation, which is the power to destroy, will impose a burden upon its citizens upon whom it must rely for its revenues and for its existence. Then, when the tax is adjudged to be void, this sovereign will say, "It is just too bad. We will slam the door of the court in your face. We will keep your money. We will not even give you your day in court."

I think the fear suggested by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] has no foundation. The Senator from Nebraska thinks immunity from taxation is based upon the right of self-preservation and that the universal privilege of being sued would result in the destruction of the Government. When these suits are brought, when and if judgment is recovered, the citizen is even then powerless, the citizen is helpless then, even though it be found he was illegally separated from his money. He can never obtain compensation until the Congress of the United States enacts a law appropriating money to make the payment. There is our last refuge. I realize it would not be desirable to be pestered with thousands and thousands of judgments amounting to billions of dollars, as the Senator suggests. I can appreciate that.

Whenever this Government compels a citizen to part with his money in violation of the Constitution, in violation of the law of the land, and that citizen suffers an actual loss, in my judgment it is to the discredit of the sovereign to say, "You shall not have your day in court."

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I desire to say a very brief word about the situation which has arisen. Although my words may be affirmative, I am really asking a question.

The particular language which appears on page 58 relates to a litigant; it undertakes to circumscribe or limit his rights, and it relates also to the jurisdiction of a court of the United States. More than that, it relates to the jurisdiction of a State court.

Passing over the question of our authority over the jurisdiction of a State court, I wish to direct a question as to our control over the jurisdiction in all cases of a United States court.

The Constitution vests the judicial power of the United States in a Supreme Court, and in such courts of inferior jurisdiction as the Congress may create. Then it goes on and provides that this judicial power shall extend, among other things, to all cases arising under the Constitution of the United States.

I wish someone would answer for me the question whether the testing of the constitutionality of a statute of the United States is not a question arising under the Constitution, and whether the authority of a United States court to pass on that question does not rest in the Constitution itself rather than upon a statute of the United States. Assuming that to be true, I next desire to ask whether we can take from one of the courts of the United States its jurisdiction to pass on the constitutionality of a statute of the United States.

Personally, while I think we may do many things—we may limit in many ways, perhaps, the right of action—I have very serious doubt whether we can say to a United States court, the source of its power being in the Constitution,

You shall not have jurisdiction to answer the question whether a statute of the United States is or is not within the purview of the Constitution of the United States."

I am glad this matter is going over, because I think the reference to the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States ought to have some serious consideration.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, with regard to the question just propounded by the Senator from Maine, I think there is no doubt that even Congress could not close the doors of the courts to any citizen who challenged the constitutionality of an act of Congress. That is not involved in the pending amendment.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. Yes.

Mr. WHITE. It seems to me it is almost necessarily involved, because I do not know how a person can raise the question of the constitutionality of a statute which lays a tax upon him except by challenging the tax or by suit to recover the tax. I think that necessarily raises the question of the authority of Congress in passing the tax statute.

Mr. GORE. The Senator in one sentence has stated the two horns of this dilemma. A citizen may go into court and challenge the constitutionality of a tax; and if he does so before having paid the tax, and the law is held to be unconstitutional, it protects him by obviating the future payment of a tax. But where the tax has already been paid, and a taxpayer challenges the constitutionality of the tax, if the courts hold that the tax is unconstitutional and void, notwithstanding such a decision Congress may close the doors of the courts when he desires to bring suit to recover the taxes already paid, even though it was an unconstitutional tax.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] asks unanimous consent that the committee amendment on page 58 be temporarily passed over. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the amendment will be passed over.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I have an amendment pending which I think is next on the list. I should like to call it up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] had the floor and undertook to offer an amendment.

Mr. GORE. It was my purpose to have my amendment go over with the committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inquire of the Senator from Texas whether his amendment is an amendment to a committee amendment?

Mr. CONNALLY. It is.

Mr. McKELLAR. On what page?

Mr. CONNALLY. Page 66.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas offers an amendment to the committee amendment which will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In lieu of the matter on page 66, lines 15 to 25, inclusive, and on page 67, lines 1 to 22, inclusive, proposed to be stricken out by the committee, it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. 32. There is authorized to be appropriated for each fiscal year an amount equal to 30 percent of the gross receipts from duties collected under the customs laws during the period January 1 to December 31, both inclusive, preceding the beginning of such fiscal year. Sums appropriated in pursuance of such authorization shall be maintained in a separate fund and shall be used by the Secretary of Agriculture only to: (1) Encourage the exportation of major agricultural commodities and products thereof by the payment of benefits in connection with the exportation thereof or of indemnities for losses incurred in connection with such exportation or by payments to producers in connection with the production of that part of any agricultural commodity required for domestic consumption; (2) encourage the domestic consumption of such commodities or products by diverting them, by the payment of benefits or indemnities or by other means, from the normal channels of trade and commerce; (3) purchase or lease, on behalf of the United States, submarginal agricultural and grazing lands; and (4) finance adjustments in the quantity planted or produced for market of agricultural commodities. The amounts appropriated in pursuance of this section shall be expended for such of the above-specified purposes, and at such times, in such manner, and in such amounts as the Secretary of Agriculture finds will tend to eliminate unprofitable agricultural and grazing lands, bring about the utilization of only such lands as can be profitably utilized, increase the exportation of agricultural commodities and products thereof, and increase the domestic consumption of agricultural commodities and products thereof: Provided, That no part of the funds authorized to be appropriated by this section shall be expended pursuant to (3) or (4) hereof unless the Secretary of Agriculture determines that the expenditure of such part pursuant to clauses (1) and (2) is not necessary to effectuate the purposes of this section: Provided further, That no part of the funds authorized to be appropriated by this section shall be used for the payment of benefits in connection with the exportation of unmanufactured cotton.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Texas whether his amendment affects the text which begins on page 64, line 20, and runs down to and including line 14 on page 66?

Mr. CONNALLY. It does not. It affects only the section following the language to which the Senator from Wisconsin has referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the Chair was in error in ordering the amendment of the Senator from Texas stated, because the next amendment in order would be section 30, on page 64.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have an amendment which I desire to offer in lieu of the text proposed to be stricken out by the committee, known as section 30. I do not desire to interfere with the procedure of the Senator from Texas, but I do not wish to lose any right to offer my amendment at the appropriate time.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, this appears to be an amendment other than a committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will construe this as a motion to strike out and insert, which would take precedence of the committee amendment to strike out. The Chair understands the purpose of the Senator from Texas to be to insert certain language in lieu of the language proposed to be stricken out by the committee amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Texas a question. Has the amendment been submitted to or considered by any standing committee of the Senate?

Mr. CONNALLY. It is practically a reenactment of the House language, with some modifications. Section 31 of the House text of the bill is substantially the same as the amendment which I have offered, except that some modifications have been made by me in an effort to obtain support for my amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. But this amendment has not been submitted to the committee?

Mr. CONNALLY. This identical amendment has not, but it is in the bill. If the Senator will look on page 66, he will see that section 31 as contained in the House bill is practically the language of the amendment, with some slight modifications; and I propose to strike out the language in the bill and insert the language contained in my amendment. It has been considered by the committee in the House as well as by the committee in the Senate.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. May I ask the Senator from Texas whether there is any other modification of the portion of the House language for which this language is proposed to be substituted except the addition of the last proviso?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes; there is some slightly different language in the middle of the amendment. I have not marked it, but there is a slight variation in the body of the amendment, though nothing of any substantial importance, I will say to the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent that this amendment be next considered, without prejudice to the rights of any Senator to offer an amendment to section 30 of the House bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In other words, I simply desire to ask for a division of the committee amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY. That was agreed to a day or two ago.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I also ask unanimous consent that I shall not lose my right in view of the fact that the Senator from Texas now desires to proceed.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I have been called out of the Chamber. I was endeavoring to take part in the writing of a new amendment on the subject which has been discussed here all day, and I could not be present for the moment when the Senator from Texas began. Is the Senate now considering his amendment?

Mr. CONNALLY. It is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas has asked unanimous consent that section 31 be next taken up, without prejudice to the rights of any Senator as to section 30, which is a different committee amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no objection at all to that, but I desire to call the Senator's attention to one slight amendment which I should like to see adopted in his amendment; that is, the elimination of the word "major."

Mr. CONNALLY. I will say to the Senator that he may offer an amendment to my amendment striking out the word "major."

Mr. JOHNSON. I am asking the Senator whether he will not accept that amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY. Personally, I have no particular objection to the Senator's amendment, except that I understand that the sentiment of the committee is that this amendment ought to be confined to major agricultural crops; and that is why I drew my amendment in that fashion.

Mr. JOHNSON. When the amendment comes up, I shall offer an amendment striking out the word "major."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas with regard to taking up section 31 at this time? The Chair hears none, and the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] in the nature of a substitute for the committee amendment striking out section 31 is before the Senate.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, this amendment, as already suggested, is in substantial accord with the House language of section 31, beginning on page 66. As the bill came to the Senate, it provided that 30 percent of the tariff revenues were authorized to be appropriated for the use of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration in stimulating exports by way of paying an export debenture—or, as some may call it, an export bounty—on agricultural products.

It is not expected that this particular provision will supplant entirely the processing taxes, but it is proposed that the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, if Congress subsequently makes the appropriation, may employ these funds for the purposes set forth in the amendment. I shall not weary the Senate by reiterating the purposes set out in the amendment. The amendment is printed and is available to Senators and I invite their attention to its particular provisions. In short, the amendment embodies the principle of the export debenture in order to aid the Government in removing from domestic supplies the surpluses and getting them out into world commerce.

If Senators will notice the amendment they will see it does not apply to raw cotton; it is restricted to manufactured cotton. Personally, I favor including all cotton; I think the amendment ought to include raw cotton as well as manufactured cotton; but that idea met so much resistance on the part of members of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and on the part of others who are interested in the question, that I modified the amendment to restrict the employment of these funds to stimulating the exportation of manufactured cotton.

That will be of particular benefit to textile manufacturers. The imposition of the processing tax has no doubt hindered domestic manufacturers of textiles in the export market. Today it is probably more difficult for them to compete in the export market than it was prior to the assessing of the processing tax. So that my amendment offers at least some degree of hope that that burden on the textile manufacturers may be somewhat lessened, and perhaps it may result in the lessening of the processing tax itself.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I have substantial sympathy with the Senator's objective, but I wish to ask him a question in respect to the practical application of the amendment.

Would it be possible under the present tariff bargaining policy and the most-favored-nation treaty conception of that policy to proceed effectually with export bounties? What is the Senator's judgment upon that question?

Mr. CONNALLY. I will say to the Senator that I have not recently inspected any of the tariff agreements or trade treaties, but I do not believe the amendment would offer any difficulty in that regard.

Let me call the Senator's attention to the fact that a great many of the countries of the earth are already employing export bounties. I will cite some of them.

Australia has an export bounty on canned fruit. It aids the states of that dominion in export bounties on sugar, and provides an export bounty on sweet wines.

In Argentina fixed prices are paid for grain exports if world prices go below a certain amount. Argentina has a modified form of export bounty on wheat.

Chile provides export bounties on wheat, flour, oats, barley, malt, hay, wine, and certain fruits and vegetables.

Estonia has a sliding differential subsidy for meat exports, hogs and bacon, derived somewhat like our processing tax, by a tax on slaughter-house processors. There are premiums to exporters of cheese, butter, and eggs.

Finland pays export premiums on butter, cheese, eggs, fowl, and live hogs.

In France the excess wheat production made it necessary to have recourse, among other schemes, to exports. France provides an export bounty on flax. In the case of wheat, since the French domestic price is usually above the world price, export bounties are being granted by the Government.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let me see if I can make my point a little plainer. I apprehend that all of the export bounties to which the Senator refers were created prior to any of the reciprocal tariff treaties, and prior to the new emphasis upon the most-favored-nation treatment. This is my question, Will not the export bounty which the Senator proposes, and which I think has great logic behind it——

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Will it not be construed abroad as dumping, and therefore is it not necessary, in conjunction with the successful operation of a scheme of this character, that we should have bilateral trade treaties with other countries, without regard to most-favored-nation treaties, so that we may frankly be permitted to operate under this method if adopted, rather than the multilateral most-favored-nation treaty system, which is virtually a barrier against that sort of thing? Does the Senator see what I am driving at?

Mr. CONNALLY. I understand the Senator. I will say, in response to his suggestion, that, of course, those countries which may object to the encouragement of our exports will probably claim that this is a modified system of dumping, but what I was trying to point out was that it is a practice which is employed by a large number of the nations of the earth.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I understand that.

Mr. CONNALLY. My understanding is that the State Department, in negotiating trade agreements, is now adopting the bilateral method rather than the multilateral method.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is technically true. But it is impossible for the State Department to do anything except in net result write a multilateral treaty so long as it extends the same advantage to all countries with which we have treaties containing the most-favored-nation clause.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say to the Senator that, even if his contention were entirely sound, that is no argument why we should not adopt the particular amendment before us, for the very good reason that it can only be employed when and if the Secretary of Agriculture adopts the system and the Congress appropriates the money out of the tariff revenues, and naturally, if the administration should run into the difficulties suggested, and should ascertain that the practice was in violation of some treaty, the President would instruct his minister, the Secretary of Agriculture, not to do it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RUSSELL in the chair). Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am raising purely the practical question as to whether we can hope to achieve anything by the adoption of the amendment, in view of the fact that it will, if used by the Department of Agriculture, apparently be in direct hostility to the foreign-trade policies now urged by the State Department.

With the Senator's permission, let me amplify that suggestion. The ideas of Mr. George N. Peek, so long as he was foreign-trade adviser to the President, it seems to me were wholly in line with the views now submitted by the Senator from Texas, and certainly entirely in line with the views which I hold; but Mr. Peek's views, being found in fatal collision with Secretary Hull's views, were set to one side, the position of foreign-trade adviser was permitted to lapse, and the Hull policy now entirely covers the foreign compacts. I am wondering how, in the face of that contemplation, there is any real hope that a provision of this character, which obviously would run against the Hull policy, offers any tangible hope.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me tell the Senator from Michigan what I would do if I entertained the views he entertains—and I do, in a measure. He says he favors this policy and believes it to be sound. If I so believed, I should vote for it, regardless of what Mr. Peek, or Mr. Hull, or Mr. Somebody Else might say about it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think that is a fair statement; I am only inquiring whether, after the Senator from Texas and I have voted for it, we have simply indulged in shadow boxing.

Mr. CONNALLY. That may be, but the duty of the Senator from Michigan and the duty of the Senator from Texas is not to hunt up bogies; if we believe in the proposal, it is our duty to do what we can here in this Chamber, where our functions obtain, and then let instrumentalities and agencies outside of this Chamber perform whatever duty they may have to perform. So I think the Senator from Michigan, if he believes in this proposal and thinks it ought to be adopted, ought to vote for it and support it and speak for it, rather than to hunt up imaginary bogies and bugaboos to destroy it in advance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Texas on the amendment has expired. The Senator from Texas is permitted to speak but once on the bill, and not to exceed 30 minutes.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thought the agreement the other day was that a Senator could speak once on the amendment and once on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that the unanimous-consent agreement permits each Senator to speak once on each amendment and once on the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Chair will pardon me, the arrangement is that a Senator may speak 15 minutes on an amendment and may divide his time if he chooses to do so, but there is to be only one speech on the bill, which may be 30 minutes in length.

Mr. CONNALLY. In other words, I have 30 minutes on the bill, and when I have used the 30 minutes, I am through, but I may speak on some subsequently offered amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas is correct.

Mr. VANDENBERG. If the Senator will permit me, in conclusion let me say that I agree with his analysis fully, and I particularly agree with his use of the word "bogey" as applied to both the Hull trade policy and the Wallace foreign-trade policy.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say to the Senator from Michigan that I have not always agreed with him on tariff policies, but I do agree with the Senator when he comes to the view I entertain as to the particular industries and enterprises in the United States which can receive a benefit from a tariff—and I have voted for many of them. If it be sound and if it be just and right for the Government to exert its power to give an artificial benefit to one industry at the expense of all the other industries, it is just as sound for an industry which cannot be protected by a protective tariff to have that tariff turned around and to have the Government exert its power to aid it in exporting its products and selling them in a world-free market in which the industry cannot get a tariff benefit.

Twice in 1929, under the administration of Mr. Hoover, the Senate, by a majority vote, passed the so-called "debenture amendment" as applied to agricultural products.

The Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] will remember that struggle. As I now recall, he voted for that amendment, as did the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and, if I mistake not, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE], and a great number of other Senators, including the Republican leader in this Chamber, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], voted in 1929 for the debenture agricultural amendment. It was killed by the House of Representatives at that time at the dictation of the then President, Mr. Hoover.

The basis of this amendment, Senators, lies in the fact that those engaged in agriculture, the cotton producers, the wheat producers and others, must sell their surplus abroad in the markets of the world, and in so doing must accept the world price without any artificial enhancement, without any device of Government to lift or raise that price. They must in the full and fair markets of the world meet competitors from every clime and every section of the earth; and if they pay the bounty on the various protected articles at home they are entitled to a similar advantage by way of the Government aiding them to export their goods so they may receive something like a fair standard of value in the foreign markets. That is all there is to this amendment.

I regret that necessity has caused me to limit the amendment in the case of cotton, the great product of my section, to manufactured cotton; but, unless I do so I am rather of the opinion that I shall not be able to secure its adoption. The producer of raw cotton is just as much entitled to the export privileges and to the export debenture and to the export bounty as is any other agricultural producer; but the textile manufacurers would oppose an export bounty on raw cotton. They would say it still further increased the burden placed upon them by the processing taxes. So, out of deference to views of members of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and other Senators, I have drawn the amendment so as to limit it in the case of cotton to manufactured cotton. Indirectly, of course, that will benefit the producer of raw cotton to a limited extent, because if the textile manufacturers in America receive some benefit from it and are able to compete in the export market they will, of course, consume more domestic cotton.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. GERRY. I should like to ask the Senator a question to ascertain if my understanding of his amendment is correct. Under his amendment he leaves it entirely discretionary, does he not, with the Secretary of Agriculture to determine where the revenue derived is to be expended and how it is to be expended? He simply sets forth four different means by which the revenue may be expended and leaves the authority entirely with the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes; very largely.

Mr. GERRY. Has the Senator figured out what the revenue item would amount to?

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not know just what it would be. It is 30 percent of the customs.

Mr. GERRY. Therefore the Secretary of Agriculture might, if he saw fit, not employ the funds for a bounty on finished commodities, but might use them entirely for any of the other three purposes set forth?

Mr. CONNALLY. He may only use it for purposes (3) and (4), provided he finds it is not needed at all for (1) and (2). In other words, he must give preference to purposes (1) and (2); and if he finds no necessity or occasion for so employing the funds he may employ them for (3) and (4).

Mr. GERRY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I shall make just a brief statement and then I shall conclude.

Let me say to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] that I did not complete the recitation of foreign countries which use the export-debenture or export-bounty principle. I shall not mention all the commodities upon which it is used, but I cite the nations of Greece, Hungary, Irish Free State, Italy, Latvia, Lithuania, the Netherlands, Poland, Union of South Africa, Uruguay, and Yugoslavia. I may add that Great Britain has heretofore employed, if it does not at the moment employ, the principle of the export debenture or the export bounty.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I wish to ask the Senator a question. As I understand his amendment, it covers corn, wheat, hogs, and so forth.

Mr. CONNALLY. It covers all the major agricultural products.

Mr. BORAH. How would the Senator describe a major product?

Mr. CONNALLY. I understand the bill defines it. Is that true?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The bill specifies the different basic commodities.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. In reference to the question asked by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], I wish to say to him that I shall offer an amendment proposing to strike out the word "major."

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, my assumption was that the bill defines what major commodities are, so my amendment is confined to them, but I have no particular desire to exclude any export product. I ask unanimous consent to delete the word "major" and insert the word "basic."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RUSSELL in the chair). The Senator from Texas has a right to modify his own amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY. I ask unanimous consent to strike out the word "major" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "basic." Then the amendment to be offered by the Senator from California will be in order.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, striking out the word "major" leaves no room for difficulties or troubles hereafter. We are going to have enough troubles with this bill as it is.

Mr. CONNALLY. Have the committee members any objection to striking out the word "major" and inserting the word "basic"?

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I have had some difficulty in analyzing the amendment; but, analyzing it as I have, I feel highly sympathetic with what it proposes to accomplish.

The amendment differs from the House language, which was stricken out by the Senate committee, in just two particulars. Those particulars are contained in lines 3 to 5 on page 2, and lines 2 to 5 on page 3 of the amendment. The first change is insignificant. The second change proposes to exempt cotton from benefit payments under the 30-percent fund. The provision is substantially the old export-debenture provision which was adopted by the Senate some years ago, and in whose behalf there was a very substantial majority.

We ask that the word "major" be stricken out, to which the Senator from Texas has graciously assented, because the word is indefinite in meaning and would give rise to endless controversy as to what is a major agricultural commodity.

Mr. CONNALLY. I will say to the Senator from California that I personally have no objection to his amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is all I ask. I join with the Senator from Texas in the request that his amendment be adopted. I should like to see tried out this particular plan, which once was adopted by the Senate. I should like to see it tried out even in the limited fashion which is here provided, and I think it might solve in some degree certain of the problems which are presented to us.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is in doubt whether or not the Senator from Texas modified his amendment by striking out the word "major."

Mr. CONNALLY. I withdraw the request and will let the amendment stand as it is. The Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] will move to strike out the word "major."

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. CAREY. I should like to ask the Senator from Texas if he did not substitute the word "basic" for the word "major"?

Mr. CONNALLY. No; I withdraw that request.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am very much in favor of this proposal. I think it is one of the unfortunate things in the history of legislation for the interests of agriculture that the debenture proposition was defeated under the last administration. I have been a believer in it and an advocate of it for some years, and I sincerely hope that this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, when this matter was before the committee we had a communication from the Treasury Department to the effect that the inclusion by the House of this section in the bill was without any consultation with the Treasury Department, and that if it should become law it would totally upset all the calculations the Treasury has made as to certain expenditures, and would deflect from their calculations the amount herein provided of 30 percent, and that the Department was totally opposed to its inclusion for the reasons set forth.

I have the communication here, but I am giving only the substance of it. It was stated that it would be necessary to find other sources of income for such amount as might be deflected for the purpose herein suggested.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, that is precisely the argument which was presented by the Secretary of the Treasury when the proposal was defeated under the former administration, that it might cost the Government $150,000,000 or $200,000,000. Since that time we have spent not only $150,000,000 or $200,000,000 but additional hundreds of millions of dollars to accomplish what, in my judgment, the debenture plan would have accomplished in large measure had it been adopted.

Mr. SMITH. I want the Senate to understand that in calling attention to this I am simply doing what I think it my duty to do—to let the Senate be advised of what a coordinate branch of the Government has indicated.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. Certainly.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Did the committee have any communication from the Secretary of Agriculture respecting his attitude toward the export debenture?

Mr. SMITH. I do not believe the Department objected to it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Is it the Senator's opinion that Secretary Wallace is in favor of this proposal?

Mr. SMITH. I do not know, but, without remembering any definite statement, my impression is that the Department of Agriculture had no objection.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Then, if it is my impression that the Department has violent objection to it, either the Senator's opinion is wrong or my opinion is wrong.

Mr. SMITH. I know the matter came up when several representatives of the Department were present. I do not remember that they expressed themselves one way or the other.

I still maintain—and want it definitely understood here and now—that I think the legislative branch of the Government ought to legislate in the light of its own opinions and convictions. Of course, there will arise occasions when the theories of a department touching some salient point ought to be considered, but I, for one, believe we ought to assume the full duty of drafting the legislation for which, under the Constitution, we are held responsible. It is for us to draft the legislation and enact it, and insist upon the recognition of our exclusive right in the realm of legislation.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. SMITH. Certainly.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I cordially concur in the Senator's general statement and I applaud his courage in stating these opinions in view of his official position in relation to spokesmanship under the present administration. However, is it not pertinent to inquire the attitude of the Secretary of Agriculture in respect to a matter which we are proposing to leave to his option? For instance, I am interested in knowing whether the option is going to be exercised.

Mr. SMITH. As it is optional, and if the Senate determines it is optional and shall be discretionary on his part, it might be pertinent to know just how he stands in respect to exercising the option we may give him.

I have stated all I care to state about it. The Senate is thoroughly competent to take such action as may be deemed wise and proper.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, what the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] said about the attitude of the Treasury Department has no influence on me whatever. When it does not want a policy adopted the Treasury Department, from the days of Mr. Mellon down, issues a statement and prophecy that if we do such a thing we will ruin the Treasury program. This proposal will, of course, divert a portion of the customs revenues; but those revenues come out of the people by taxation. We are going to have a tax bill during this session and we can take care of any necessities in the tax bill.

I for one resent the attitude of the Cabinet and administrative officers in constantly lecturing the Senate and the Congress about what we should or should not do. They are simply glorified hired men, and if they will attend to their business in the Cabinet and in their departments, we can attend to our business in the Senate and the House of Representatives.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Hear! Hear!

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not care if the Cabinet or the State Department or anybody else advises against this amendment, I am in favor of trying out the export bounty plan. It has been before the country for years. It has been before the Senate on two different occasions. If it will not work, we had better find it out. If it does work, we may then develop it and elaborate it as the exigencies of the times may require.

Mr. BORAH. If it does work, it will far more than take care of any loss to the Treasury.

Mr. CONNALLY. To be sure. The Senator from Idaho is correct that if it does work it will bring more money into the hands of the American producers than would be taken out by the process of taxation.

Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] spoke about antidumping laws and other nations throwing up their hands and crying out about antidumping laws. There are countries in Europe today that need American farm products, that are hungry for them, and yet are not getting them because of artificial impediments to trade. The tariff is a hindrance to trade. The high tariff is a hurdle over which commerce has to leap. This plan is an encouragement to trade. It would open up the channels of trade. It would remove some of the snags and stimulate the free flow of commerce from America to foreign countries.

In behalf of the producer, the primary producer, the man who sweats and labors in the fields to produce the necessities of life, I believe now is the time for the Congress to assert some of its own views and to adopt this amendment and try out this experiment, if it be desired to call it such, with regard to the debenture or export subsidy system.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] to the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I entered the Chamber a few minutes ago, having been absent for a short time upon official business at the Department of State, and heard only the concluding remarks of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY]. I regret not having had an opportunity to hear his entire address, because it is possible I may not fully comprehend his purpose or the object of the amendment which is under discussion. I have hastily glanced at the amendment but have had no opportunity to analyze it, and perhaps do not fully comprehend its scope and implications. However, from the imperfect examination which I have given it, I cannot give it my support.

First, let me briefly refer to the observations made by the Senator respecting the position taken by the Secretary of the Interior. As I understood the Senator, I do not disagree with his position as to the duties resting upon the legislative branch of the Government. Congress, and not the executive department, deals with legislative matters; Congress enacts the laws and the responsibility rests upon the executive department to see that they are executed.

It is quite true that not infrequently the executive branches of the Government are too importunate in seeking legislation, and it cannot be denied that they have sought to influence, as many believe, improperly, the Congress of the United States in connection with proposed legislation under consideration by both branches of Congress. Executive departments, bureaus, and organizations have often drafted and attempted to secure the passage of measures increasing their authority and expanding their jurisdiction. I believe that there has been too much pressure brought by executive departments to secure legislation and to direct policies which the Government should follow—policies the formulation of which rests with the legislative branch of the Government.

However there are obligations resting upon executive departments and agencies of the Government to advise Congress with respect to matters under consideration by it. It is the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to submit reports from time to time for the consideration of Congress with respect to revenues and the financial affairs of the Government. It is his duty to submit data and information that will aid Congress in enacting revenue and financial measures. As Senators know whenever revenue bills are under consideration the Secretary of the Treasury is called upon to submit his views and to furnish information respecting the fiscal needs of the Government and the condition of the Treasury, in order that needed legislation may be enacted. Only a few days ago the Committee on Ways and Means of the House began the consideration of a revenue measure. The President had recommended that additional revenues be obtained by increasing the taxes upon incomes of individuals and corporations and also by increasing the demands made upon estates, gifts, and so forth.

It was necessary that the Secretary of the Treasury supply information to the committee in order that it might deal wisely with the important questions before it. It is the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to keep Congress informed as to the financial needs of the Government, the expenditures which are made, and the sources from which revenue may be derived. It has been the practice of the Department of the Treasury for years to prepare and submit estimates of governmental receipts and disbursements and to supply full and detailed information regarding all matters connected with the fiscal affairs of the Government. The Department of the Treasury estimates the receipts which it expects will be derived from import duties, and includes such estimated receipts as a part of the aggregate revenues which will be derived from all sources in order to meet the expenditures of the Government.

My understanding is that the Secretary, in submitting reports required by law, dealing with the fiscal affairs of the Government for the last and present fiscal years, estimated the customs receipts, and included such estimates as a part of the total revenues expected to be derived during each of these years. My recollection is that the President, in the Budget which he submitted to Congress, took cognizance of the report of the Secretary respecting the revenues to be derived from customs, and based his views as to the total revenues and the expenditures, in part at least, upon the proportion of the former which would be derived from import duties.

It was, therefore, in my opinion, entirely proper for the Treasury Department to advise Congress as to the results that would follow the diversion of 30 percent of the customs receipts from the Treasury Department to meet the expenses of the Government, and to transfer them to the Secretary of Agriculture to be expended by him under a broad and latitudinarian discretion for purposes not contemplated by the President when he prepared and submitted to Congress his Budget for the next fiscal year.

The measure before us, if I interpret it correctly, will lay its hands upon the customs receipts and take therefrom 30 percent, which, under the estimates to which I have referred, were to have been paid into the Treasury of the United States for use in meeting the ordinary and extraordinary expenses of the Government.

Senators are familiar with the fact that the Treasury Department has occasionally been criticized for its alleged failure to submit accurate estimates as to receipts and disbursements. I think it should be said, in justice to the Treasury Department, that its officials have been careful in the preparation of their estimates, and have, in the main, discharged their duties with remarkable ability, and certainly with fidelity. The present Secretary of the Treasury, as we all know, is earnestly and intelligently addressing himself to the very heavy responsibilities resting upon him. I am glad that he has called attention to the fact that the diversion of a part of the customs receipts from the Treasury of the United States and their application to other than the meeting of the expenses of the Government would increase the Federal deficit and lead to some confusion in the fiscal affairs of the Government.

Mr. President, a hasty examination of the amendment under consideration shows how indefinite and uncertain are its terms. It is only certain in one thing, namely, that 30 percent of all of the customs receipts are not to be placed in the Treasury, where they belong, but are to be delivered over to the Secretary of Agriculture, to be expended largely as he may see fit, or, at any rate, to be expended without proper limitations and without rational standards or reasonable restrictions.

It is impossible to determine what the total customs receipts for this or the next fiscal year or subsequent years will be. A number of years ago the customs receipts were from $400,000,000 to more than $600,000,000 annually. For 1933 the customs receipts were only $250,000,000. My recollection is that the total customs receipts for the fiscal year ending June 30 of this year were approximately $340,000,000. While it is true that 30 percent of $340,000,000 is not impressive, measured by the total receipts of the Government for the present fiscal year of approximately $3,800,000,000, exclusive of postal receipts, nevertheless it is a factor to be considered in preparing estimates of receipts and disbursements for any given period.

If Congress were disposed to appropriate any considerable sum for the uncertain purposes indicated in the amendment before us, prudence (and if I may be permitted the expression, common sense) would demand a definite appropriation; but the amendment before us calls for an indefinite appropriation and perhaps for an indefinite period. It does not take cognizance of the fact that the customs receipts may be greater or may be less during the future years. It seems to me incredible that Congress would be willing to embark the Government upon an uncharted sea such as the amendment before us contemplates. May I ask in all seriousness, Is it fair to the taxpayers or fair to the Government to make such uncertain commitments as provided in this amendment? I know during the past few years we have been dealing with not millions but hundreds of millions and billions of dollars until I sometimes feel that our vision has become clouded, our judgments distorted, and our appreciation of sound principles of finance and governmental politicies impaired.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MINTON in the chair). The time of the Senator from Utah on the amendment has expired. The Senator has 30 minutes on the bill, if the Senator desires to take it.

Mr. KING. I will take part of my time on the bill.

If it is deemed proper to appropriate money by way of bounty or subsidy or whatever name may be given it, for the purchase of submarginal lands or for the purposes indicated in the amendment under consideration, then I respectfully submit it should be done in an open, frank, and courageous manner. If $90,000,000 or $100,000,000 or $200,000,000 are to be appropriated in aid of agriculture then let us frankly avow the purpose to do so and make a direct appropriation from the Treasury of the United States. In that manner the people would know what amount Congress was providing for the purposes indicated in the amendment.

They would know when they read the Treasury report what proportion of the receipts were employed as a subsidy or bounty or grant to agriculture. Indefinite and uncertain appropriations are not only unwise but, I believe, unfair to the taxpayers of the Government, and for that reason, if for none other, the amendment under consideration should be defeated.

Mr. President, we all sympathize with the hardships through which the farmers of the United States have passed and the problems which are now before them. It may be said, in passing, however, that there are millions of American citizens without employment and without homes. Industries have suffered and millions who have been employed in industrial activities have likewise passed through trying days, and even now they are still within the shadows. It is not only those employed in agriculture who have suffered during this depression, but millions of individuals in other walks and activities of life have, as I have stated, had their sorrows and days of distress.

Millions have lost their homes and millions perhaps have never had homes. During the period to which I have referred factories, mills, and mines have been closed, and armies of men and women were deprived of employment. Today there are millions of American citizens who have no jobs and no means of support.

I do not challenge attention to these matters for the purpose of minimizing the hardships of the farmers and the problems with which they are now confronted. It has been said that when any branch of our economic or industrial life suffers its effects are materially manifest in every other avenue of public or private life. We rise or fall together. The advancement of one is the advancement of all. Of course, it is desired that the farmers of our country enjoy prosperity. Indeed, when they are prosperous it may safely be said that the clouds of adversity in every part of the land will be largely dispelled.

Mr. President, conceding for a moment that there should be relief granted to agriculture either through bounties or subsidies, it seems to me that the bill which came from the House and is now under consideration by the Senate should not be employed as a vehicle to accomplish that result. The bill before us contains amendments to the Agricultural Adjustment Act. It is claimed that it is to supplement that act and to clarify some of its provisions and, as I am advised, to possibly relieve it of its imperfections and inequalities, if not provisions unconstitutional in character. There are many who believe the Agricultural Adjustment Act to be unconstitutional and also to rest upon no sound or logical or just foundation, and that it is doomed ultimately, even if found to be free from constitutional taint, to prove so unsatisfactory in its results as to meet an early end.

The Agricultural Adjustment Act was regarded by the friends of agriculture as more than an experiment; indeed, many asserted that it was a panacea for the ills of agriculture and would bring to the farmer a golden age of prosperity. The same geniuses who devised the Agricultural Adjustment Administration Act have administered it and have provided the bill which is now under consideration.

Other policies have been formulated and are being carried into effect by the Agricultural Department to supplement the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and it is claimed to contributed to the advancement of the interests of agriculture. Such important results have been promised by these measures that it would seem highly improper to attach to them the provisions found in the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas. I can readily understand, notwithstanding the many asservations as to the efficacy of the measures formulated by the Agricultural Department, that there are some who have been protagonists of those measures who have some apprehension as to their virtue and are therefore seeking to discover other ways and means and further devices to promote the interests of agriculture. I repeat, however, that regardless of their misgivings and apprehensions consideration of provisions such as those found in the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas should be deferred pending the results of existing law, supplemented by the new A. A. A. bill reported by the House and now before us. In other words, if the measures which were to accomplish such great results are inadequate and will fail to meet the expectations of those who devised the same and have given them their support, then, when such failure is manifest, it will be time to consider other plans.

Indeed, Mr. President, there are some who believe that some of the experiments which have been introduced into our economic and industrial life of late, and similar experiments which have been introduced into the social and industrial life of other countries, have not, and will not, accomplish the results desired; that many of the efforts to disturb economic and natural laws, instead of accomplishing good, produce evil results.

Mr. President, I have referred to the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas as being uncertain and indefinite in its terms. Permit me to invite attention to some of its provisions in justification for this statement. The amendment declares that the 30 percent of the gross receipts from duties collected under the customs laws of the United States—

> Shall be used by the Secretary of Agriculture to encourage the exportation of major agricultural commodities and products.

I might add in passing that the exportation of agricultural products can be not only successfully encouraged but accomplished if we will pursue a course similar to that followed by our Government for many years. The exports of the United States have reached the stupendous sum of between $7,000,000,000 and $8,000,000,000, and a very large part of these exports consisted of agricultural products. More than 60 percent of the cotton produced in the United States was purchased by foreign countries, and the farmers of the United States found foreign markets for their surplus wheat and corn and dairy and other products. By reason of almost prohibitive tariffs we lost much of our foreign market, and the farmers of the United States were among those who suffered by reason of the loss of foreign markets.

How is the Secretary to encourage exportation of agricultural products? I have indicated what I conceive to be the most certain and effective way to insure the sale in foreign markets of American agricultural commodities. But the amendment suggests that the encouragement is to be brought about by paying benefits, presumably to those who export their commodities. The amendment presupposes losses because of the export of commodities and calls for the payment of indemnities. There is nothing to indicate what commodities will be exported; what losses will be sustained; how the indemnities are to be divided. It is obvious that a vast bureaucratic organization must be set up to gather agricultural products for export, to search for markets abroad; to enter into negotiations perhaps with foreign nations because they undoubtedly will have something to say with respect to what commodities shall be brought into their respective states. It may be charged by them that the United States is dumping its surplus agricultural products in violation of the laws of the countries into which such commodities may be transported. It is certain that any such policy will bring retaliation and repercussions of a serious character. It is also certain that a policy such as suggested would run counter to the provisions of the Reciprocity Act, which is receiving attention at the hands of our State Department.

It is easy to envision a multitude of difficulties and problems that will be encountered in the execution of the uncertain provisions of the amendment under consideration. The amendment further provides that the moneys derived from the 30-percent customs may be used by the Secretary of Agriculture to encourage domestic consumption of commodities or products by diverting them, whatever that means, by the payment of benefits or indemnities or whatever means, from the normal channels of commerce. I cannot conceive of such unlimited and unrestricted authority being given to an Executive agent. There is no necessity of encouraging domestic consumption of commodities. The American people are ready to purchase and use domestic products where needed and if and when they are able to buy the same. But as I understand the amendment, the Secretary can pay benefits or indemnities to induce people to use commodities. At any rate, the Secretary may pay benefits or indemnities or take any steps he may see fit to divert, whatever that may mean, commodities from the normal channels of trade and commerce. One would suppose that it was desirable to have commodities used in the normal channels of trade and commerce and to enlarge such channels, but apparently the channels are to be dammed and efforts made to prevent normal consumption and the usual and proper utilization of the channels through which trade and commerce flow. But that is not all the Secretary is empowered to do.

He is authorized to purchase and lease on behalf of the United States submarginal agricultural and grazing lands. Senators know that there are now several Federal agencies empowered to purchase so-called "submarginal lands", and my understanding is that large tracts of lands have been purchased in many States. Millions of dollars have been expended for this purpose and lands which have been subject to taxation by the States are now the property of the Federal Government. It seems to be the view of some that the Federal Government should become a great landlord; that it should acquire hundreds of millions of acres of land, withdraw the same from taxation, and either permit the land to lie fallow or to attempt all sorts of experiments for its utilization. The Government is not a satisfactory landlord, and I predict that some of these schemes originated by doctrinaires and persons devoid of that realistic conception of the problems and difficulties of life, will meet with utter failure. However, the point I am attempting to make is that there are no limitations upon the authority of the Secretary under this amendment and he could employ the entire annual fund obtained from customs duties for the purchase of so-called "submarginal agricultural and grazing lands."

The amendment further provides that the Secretary may finance adjustments in the quantity planted or produced for market of agricultural commodities.

It seems to me that no more uncertain and ambiguous language could be employed to conceal one or more purposes. What is meant by "adjustments in quantity planted or produced"? Is it meant that the Secretary shall have unlimited power to determine what maladjustments exist in production, and to determine how to adjust the crops as to quantity and character which are to be planted or produced; that he shall have full authority to determine whether the crops planted or produced are for foreign markets or for domestic markets; whether these adjustments shall be made in one State or in many States; whether they shall apply to one group or to many groups?

It is quite likely that if this measure should become law, whoever administered it, with the unrestricted authority given, could say that adjustment is needed in the quantity of oranges produced or planted; that California should only plant or produce 100,000 acres; that the production should be only for domestic consumption and that within a limited number of the States. The official administering the law would have authority to finance the cotton growers or wheat growers of one State and not of another; to determine the amount of wheat which should be planted in one State or in a number of States. Indeed, the provisions of this amendment are so indefinite, so susceptible of a multitude of interpretations as to condemn the scheme though the goal sought to be reached may have merit.

We know that the Secretary of Agriculture has been hostile to the bringing of new lands under cultivation or to increasing the productivity of lands which perhaps for years have been cultivated. This attitude has resulted in the purchase by the Government of millions of acres of lands, as I have before stated; so I repeat, the Secretary, without there being any prohibitions, any restrictions, could utilize the entire annual funds obtained from customs duties to purchase and withdraw from cultivation grazing lands or submarginal lands. Such a course would not aid in the expanding of foreign markets for agricultural commodities.

Mr. President, just a few words in respect to a matter germane to the questions under discussion. As I have heretofore indicated, we have lost a considerable part of our foreign market. I believe that that is largely due to unwise legislation which has been enacted by Congress. Following the Civil War we embarked upon a policy of extreme protection, and succeeding Congresses, until the year 1930, multiplied tariff laws and increased tariff duties. We built perhaps the highest tariff wall that could be found among civilized nations. There were some who believed that we should have what was called "a Chinese wall" around our borders so that all imports might be prevented. We had fierce nationalists, indeed isolationists, who were averse to proper contacts and intercourse with other nations who were so self-centered that they were unwilling, even for cultural and spiritual forces, to have cooperation throughout the world, if the United States was to have any part in developing or promoting such forces.

It is a matter of common knowledge that many of the agricultural States of the United States were the strongest supporters of exclusive tariffs; and it is known of all that some of the States to which I have just referred for many years gave almost undeviating support to the Republican Party and to those elements in the Republican Party whose philosophy was largely founded upon the concept that the tariff was the panacea for all social, political, and economic ills.

I do not desire to be critical, but it cannot be denied that the plight of agriculture has been in part due to the zeal with which many of the agricultural States defended and promoted tariff legislation. It is known that the Republican Party in the agricultural States, as well as in many of the Northern States, has been in the ascendancy largely because of the agricultural votes.

Mr. President, as the result of this tariff legislation and other restrictive and unsound economic policies, we built up a more or less artificial economic and industrial structure, and under the influence of the philosophy which resulted in its establishment, policies were put into effect and legislation enacted that have contributed to the economic debacle through which we have passed, and to the financial disasters which have visited individuals, communities, States, and the Nation itself.

Mr. President, I have hastily and imperfectly discussed the amendment before us. In conclusion, may I say that I do not think it an auspicious occasion to adopt the amendment, and I feel certain that the bill which is before us should not be the organism to which this amendment should be attached.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I wish to speak briefly on the amendment.

To the principle underlying the export debenture I do not find myself in opposition. At this time I think it may be confusing and even harmful to attempt to put into effect the provision now under consideration. It authorizes the appropriation of 30 percent of the customs revenues for four purposes; namely, to—

(1) Encourage the exportation of major agricultural commodities and products.

It is proposed to strike out the word "major", so as to leave in the statute no limit on the agricultural products to be promoted in export. The manner in which that is to be accomplished is by the payment of benefits in connection with exportation, or of indemnities for losses incurred in exportation, or by payment to producers in connection with production.

The second purpose is to—

(2) Encourage the domestic consumption of such commodities or products by diverting them, by the payment of benefits or indemnities or by other means, from the normal channels of trade and commerce.

I do not understand what is the process to be employed. How is it proposed to promote domestic consumption by diverting commodities or products from the normal channels of trade? I assume that the language has a well-defined meaning in the mind of its author.

The third purpose is to—

(3) Purchase or lease, on behalf of the United States, submarginal agricultural and grazing lands.

As stated by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], we have already made liberal arrangements to that end. It is the opinion, I have heard, of the Secretary of State that the injection of this plan at this time would confuse the problem of increasing our export commerce, and might result in retaliation.

In addition to that, 30 percent of the customs revenues would be so manifestly inadequate for the four purposes stated in the bill that I do not believe it would accomplish a very wholesome result. Assuming that 30 percent of the customs revenues would be $90,000,000, which I think the Secretary of the Treasury stated in a letter to the chairman would approximate the amount, it is perfectly clear that $90,000,000 used for benefit payments in promoting export commerce would be, as we often say, a mere drop in the bucket. It would be so absolutely inadequate that it would fail before it had been very long applied.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. GORE. I was wondering if the Senator would be able to tell us why the amendment provides that one-third of the customs duties shall be set aside for this purpose, instead of carrying in the bill an appropriation of the amount that would come to.

Mr. ROBINSON. I presume the reason in the mind of the author of the amendment is that he is seeking to provide a perennial appropriation or authorization, and that he may also anticipate some increase in the customs revenues, and that it would be easier to pass through the Congress a provision of this nature than it would be to pass a direct appropriation.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is the Senator opposed in principle to this proposal?

Mr. ROBINSON. No, Mr. President; I stated in the beginning that I did not find myself in opposition to the principle underlying the export debenture. I thought I made that clear.

Mr. CONNALLY. I was out of the Chamber. I am sorry I did not hear the Senator state that.

Mr. ROBINSON. But I stated the reasons which prompt me to the conclusion that it is a very doubtful proceeding to incorporate this amendment in the bill. I usually find myself in hearty accord with the Senator from Texas, but I think this is a hopelessly inadequate provision insofar as accomplishing very much in increasing export trade is concerned.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is it the Senator's chief objection that it is inadequate? We might, with his influence, be able to increase it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, that is one objection. I think I ought to be entirely frank on that subject. To make the customs revenues available for the purposes set out in this amendment would undoubtedly upset the financial arrangements of the Government. I say, in support of what the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has said, that I see no objection to the Secretary of the Treasury expressing his opinion on that subject. In fact, I think it is a wholesome thing for him to do. If we should appropriate $500,000,000, which was the amount carried in the Farm Marketing Act, and which proved wholly ineffective—that act failed, as I think we all agree—we should use the entire customs revenues, and at this time I think we ought to give very careful consideration to a process calculated to accomplish that end.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MINTON in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] to the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] in the nature of a substitute for the committee amendment. [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President; and before the request is acted upon I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Which amendment is the Senate now voting on?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] to the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] in the nature of a substitute for the committee amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. I withdraw the request for the yeas and nays. Let us vote on that question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] to the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] in the nature of a substitute for the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], as amended, in the nature of a substitute for the committee amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. DAVIS (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON], who is detained in a committee meeting, and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CONNALLY. I desire to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] is detained by important business.

Mr. ROBINSON. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], and the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS].

I also wish to announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE], the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH], the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DUFFY], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN], the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MOORE], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS], the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN], the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] are detained from the Senate on official business.

I wish further to announce that the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] is paired with the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS]. If the Senator from New York were present and voting, he would vote "yea", and the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] would vote "nay."

I desire also to announce the general pair of the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE].

So Mr. CONNALLY's amendment, as amended, to the committee amendment, was rejected.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, in connection with the vote taken yesterday on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the roll-call vote taken on the export-debenture scheme on October 19, 1929, appearing on page 4694 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 71, part 5, Seventy-first Congress, first session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The roll-call vote referred to is as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. * * * The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] [providing for export debentures.]

Mr. Norris and Mr. Heflin demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BLAINE (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. Hatfield]. If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "yea." I am authorized to announce that if the junior Senator from West Virginia were present and voting he would vote "nay."

Mr. CARAWAY (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. Deneen]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD], who, if he were present, would vote as I shall vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. JONES (when the name of Mr. Edge was called). The senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. Edge] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS]. If the Senator from New Jersey were present, he would vote "nay." I understand that if the senior Senator from Maryland were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. KING (when his name was called). Upon this vote I am paired with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. Ransdell], and, therefore, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SCHALL (when Mr. SHIPSTEAD's name was called). The senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD], if present, would vote "yea." He has a pair on this vote with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. Deneen].

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. Burton] to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND]. If the senior Senator from New York were present, he would vote as I intend to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SWANSON (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. Fess]. I am unable to obtain a transfer. If the senior Senator from Ohio were present, he would vote "nay", and if I were permitted to vote I would vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. Glenn], and vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BLEASE. I have a pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. Goff], who is absent. Not knowing how he would vote if he were present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. BINGHAM (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. In his absence I transfer my pair to the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. Dale] and permit my vote to stand.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. Ransdell] is necessarily absent on official business. If present, he would vote "nay." His pair has been announced.

Mr. SWANSON. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. GLASS] is necessarily absent. If present, he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 42, nays 34, as follows:

YEAS, 42—Ashurst, Barkley, Black, Borah Bratton, Brock, Brookhart, Broussard, Caraway, Connally, Cutting, Dill, Fletcher, Frazier, George, Harris, Harrison, Hawes, Hayden, Heflin, Howell, Johnson, La Follette, McKellar, McMaster, Norbeck, Norris, Nye, Overman, Pine, Pittman, Robinson of Arkansas, Schall, Sheppard, Simmons, Steck, Stephens, Thomas of Idaho, Thomas of Oklahoma, Trammell, Walsh of Montana, and Wheeler.

NAYS, 34—Allen, Bingham, Capper, Couzens, Gillett, Goldsborough, Gould, Greene, Hale, Hastings, Hebert, Jones, Kean, Kendrick, Keyes, McNary, Metcalf, Moses, Oddie, Patterson, Phipps, Reed, Robinson of Indiana, Sackett, Shortridge, Smoot, Steiwer, Townsend, Vandenberg, Wagner, Walcott, Walsh of Massachusetts, Warren, and Watson.

NOT VOTING, 19—Blaine, Blease, Burton, Copeland, Dale Deneen, Edge, Fess, Glass, Glenn, Goff, Hatfield, King, Ransdell, Shipstead, Smith, Swanson, Tydings, and Waterman.

So Mr. NORRIS' amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment to strike out section 31.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I should like to recur to an amendment on page 58, which was passed over. I think an amendment to the amendment has been prepared.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to recur to page 58 for the purpose of considering an amendment to the committee amendment. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The clerk will state the amendment.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, before the clerk states the amendment, I desire the Senate to understand that the question really involves the amendment on page 58 and the amendment on page 61 so as to bring the elements of both into one amendment. It would be necessary, after the amendment is stated, if we are to consider it, to reconsider the vote by which the amendment on page 61 was adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. Let us have the amendment reported.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] has an amendment which he desires to present.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the chairman of the committee has correctly stated the parliamentary situation. Before the amendment is in order we have to reconsider the vote by which the amendment on page 61 was adopted. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. ROBINSON. Let the amendment be reported first.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the parliamentary situation to be this. The Senator from South Carolina asked unanimous consent to return to page 58 and consider an amendment which had been passed over. That consent was given. The clerk will state the amendment which was passed over.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed by the committee, on page 57, after line 21, to strike out:

No suit or proceeding shall be brought or maintained in, nor shall any judgment or decree be entered by, any court for the recoupment, set-off, refund, or credit of, or on any counterclaim for, any amount of any tax assessed, paid, collected, or accrued under this title prior to the date of the adoption of this amendment.

And in lieu thereof to insert the following:

No Federal or State court shall have jurisdiction to entertain a suit or proceeding against the United States or any collector of internal revenue or other internal-revenue officer or any person who has been such a collector or officer or the personal representative of any such collector, officer, or person (nor shall any such suit or proceeding be brought or maintained in, nor shall any judgment or decree be entered by, any such court) (1) for the recoupment, set-off, recovery, refund, or credit of, or on any counterclaim for, any amount of any tax, interest, or penalty, assessed, paid, collected, or accrued under this title prior to the date of the adoption of this amendment or (2) for damages for the collection thereof.

The VICE PRESIDENT. When this amendment was passed over there was pending an amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. The clerk will state the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I now withdraw the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska withdraws his amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, pending the debate it was suggested that perhaps the purpose of the Senator from Nebraska in offering his amendment could be served by amending subsection (d) of the same section on page 61; but in order to consider the amendment to that subsection unanimous consent would have to be given to reconsider the vote by which subsection (d) on page 61 was heretofore adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The ordinary procedure probably would be for the Senate to consider the amendment on page 58, and then reconsider the amendment on page 61 in order to permit the Senator from Georgia to offer his amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, that would be the ordinary procedure; but, as a matter of fact, if the Senate should adopt the amendment agreed upon by those who were in the conference to the committee amendment on page 61, known as subsection (d), it would follow as a matter of course that the committee amendment on page 58 should be rejected. I think I have properly stated the matter.

Mr. SMITH. That is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. So, in order to deal with the subject, before passing on the amendment on page 58 we should have to consider the amendment of the Senator from Georgia in regard to subsection (d) on page 61.

The VICE PRESIDENT. From the statement made by the Senator from Nebraska, it seems to the Chair that the ordinary process would be to reconsider the amendment on page 61, in order to permit the Senator from Georgia to offer his amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. But, Mr. President, before consent is given to reconsider the action of the Senate in agreeing to the amendment designated as subsection (d), on page 61, I insist on the reading of the amendment which is to be offered as a substitute for it. I wish to know what is in it. I am not going to consent to a reconsideration until I know what is in the substitute amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator from Georgia will offer his amendment to the amendment on page 61.

Mr. ROBINSON. No; I object to its being offered until it has been read. I ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It cannot be read until the Senator offers it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly it can.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Georgia may offer his amendment for the purpose of having it read for the information of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I have sent to the desk the amendment, which has been prepared by one of the clerks assisting the chairman of the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted on page 61, line 15, to line 12, on page 62, inclusive, it is proposed to insert the following:

(d) No recovery, recoupment, set-off, refund, or credit shall be made or allowed nor shall any counterclaim be allowed for any amount of any tax, penalty, or interest which accrued before or after the date of the adoption of this amendment under this title (including any overpayment of such tax), unless the claimant establishes to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, or in the case of a judicial proceeding establishes in such proceeding, (1) that he has not included such amount in the price of the article with respect to which it was imposed or of any article processed from the commodity with respect to which it was imposed, that he has not collected from the vendee any part of such amount, and that the price paid to the producer was not reduced by any part of such amount, or (2) that he has repaid such amount to the ultimate purchaser of the article, or in case the price paid to the producer was reduced by such amount, to such producer; nor shall any judgment or decree be entered by any Federal or State court for damages for the collection thereof, unless the claimant establishes the foregoing facts in (1) or (2) as the case may be, in addition to all other facts required to be established. The provisions of this subsection shall not apply to any refund or credit under subsection (a) or (c) of section 15, section 16, or section 17, of this title, or to any refund or credit to the processor of any tax paid by him with respect to articles exported pursuant to the provisions of section 317 of the Tariff Act of 1930.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the amendment now offered, or which it is desired to offer if unanimous consent shall be given to reconsider the committee amendment, simply permits recoveries or recoupments or set-offs or credits for a tax or a penalty paid before the passage of the existing act, or on the date of the passage of the new act, or thereafter, upon the conditions stated in the amendment, which, it is submitted, makes it rather difficult, and places the burden upon the taxpayer; but the view taken, I believe, by practically all Members of the Senate is that there should be no recovery in a case where the tax had actually been passed on.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. On page 62, lines 2 and 3 and part of line 4, appear the words—and that the price paid to the producer was not reduced by such amount.

It occurs to me that probably there ought to be an insertion there of the words "or any part thereof." How does that strike the Senator from Georgia? It seems that in order to avoid a recovery there it might be necessary to show that the claimant had not collected the exact amount of the tax, or had not reduced the price paid to the producer by the exact amount.

Mr. GEORGE. That had occurred to those who entered the conference, not in precisely that connection, but in connection with substantially the same provision on line 2. It was called to our attention by the experts that the provision here is that no recovery of any amount of any tax shall be made, not of any tax, but of any amount of any tax, so that it was the judgment of the experts that no additional words were necessary to carry out the idea.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I should like to ask the Senator if there is not an error in grammar here, or, at least, whether the clause beginning in line 7 and running through line 10 does not cover more than the Senator desires? If I understand the proposed amendment correctly, it is intended to provide that no recovery may be obtained unless the claimant establishes the facts set forth in clause 1 or in clause 2. When the Senator comes to say that no judgment shall be rendered, he says, "Unless the claimant establishes the foregoing facts." That, of course, refers to both clause 1 and clause 2. Is it not the intent to provide that no judgment shall be rendered unless the claimant establishes the facts set forth in clause 1 or in clause 2?

Mr. GEORGE. While I had nothing to do with the preparation of the bill, I think that language refers entirely to subsection (2) on page 58, "for damages for the collection thereof." I think that was the intent.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. "The foregoing facts" refers to clause 1 or clause 2.

Mr. GEORGE. The first provision is that no recovery, recoupment, or refund of credit shall be had except upon specified conditions, and if we supply all the omitted thought, second, that no judgment shall be entered for damages unless the same facts are made to appear.

I submit the matter to the chairman of the committee, because that part of it is the committee amendment.

Mr. SMITH. I understand the language in reference to judgments refers to clause 1 or clause 2. The purpose is that it shall refer to clause 1 or clause 2.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That is exactly what I understood, but the language does not say that.

Mr. SMITH. That is the intent and purpose.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It seems to me that the author of the amendment should modify it so as to make it read "unless the claimant establishes the fact set forth in the foregoing clause 1 or clause 2."

Mr. SMITH. That would be all right, if that appeals to the Senator to be clearer, because that is the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. That is the purpose of the amendment and I will say to the Senator from Wyoming that he is now dealing with the committee amendment and not the part of the amendment we considered.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I realize that. I make the motion, then, that the perfecting amendment I have suggested be made.

Mr. SMITH. I would suggest the language "in clause (1) or clause (2), as the case may be." Then it would be perfectly clear.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I move that the amendment be so amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment is not in order until the vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to is reconsidered.

Request has been made that the vote by which the committee amendment on page 61 was agreed to be reconsidered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the vote is reconsidered. The question is now on the committee amendment on page 61.

Mr. GEORGE obtained the floor.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield to me?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. I am very much in accord with the views of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], and I should like to know what effect the amendment just offered would have on the committee amendment on page 58, which, as I view it, takes all jurisdiction away from the courts.

Mr. GEORGE. I will say to the Senator from Nevada that if the amendments which are now suggested by the Senator from Idaho, the Senator from Nebraska, the Senator from California, the Senator from Oklahoma, and the Senator from Georgia should be adopted, all the language on page 58 and down to the end of line 5, on page 59, would be eliminated from the bill. The amendment I have offered would be by way of substitute, or rather it would combine in this section which the committee itself inserted, with reference to taxes imposed under the amended act, provision for the recovery of refunds or of overpayments, assessments, and so forth, under the existing act, as well as under the amended act; so that the language of section 21 (a) would be stricken from the bill.

Mr. McCARRAN. I should like to ask a further question, simply for information and enlightenment. Under the Senator's amendment would the courts still be open to litigants? It seems to me the amendment on page 58 would preclude all litigants from an avenue to the courts.

Mr. GEORGE. That would be stricken out.

Mr. McCARRAN. So that the courts would still be open to an adjustment or an adjudication?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes. It is unnecessary now, but the Senator will notice that, on page 59, subdivision (b), which is not under consideration, is a prohibition against the extraordinary remedy of injunction to restrain the collection of the tax, and, of course, it would follow that the complaining taxpayer would be remitted to his legal remedy under subdivision (d), on page 61.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I did not hear all the debate between the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Wyoming, and so that there may be no misunderstanding I may say that the intention of those who agreed on the amendment the Senator from Georgia has offered was that if the amendment were agreed to and subsection (d), on page 61, modified in accordance therewith, then the committee amendment, on page 58, would be rejected or withdrawn, because the object of changing the language on page 61 is to take in everything that was intended to be covered on page 58.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the Senator from Georgia to the amendment on page 61. I also ask the attention of the Senator from Nebraska, and I should like to have the attention of the senior Senator from Idaho. If I read it correctly, the provision on page 58 means that there is no avenue by which those who claim redress may resort to the courts, to put it very briefly and concisely.

If my view as to the committee amendment on page 58 is at all correct, then I take it that the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia is to remedy that condition. I am merely asking the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Nebraska, and I ask the concurrence of those who are in accord with my views, as to whether or not there will always be open, under the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia, an avenue to the courts of this country for a redress of wrongs?

Mr. NORRIS. I would say "yes" to that question. The burden of proof, however, is on the plaintiff who commences the action, and he can recover only under the conditions named in the amendment read by the Senator from Georgia. If he has paid a processing tax, he must first show that he has not passed it on to somebody else. He can only recover for what he shows, by proof, he has not passed on. He must also show that in the original purchase he has not pushed the processing tax over onto the producer.

I think the amendment under discussion will accomplish much more than I sought to accomplish by the amendment which I offered on page 58. Under the conditions named in the amendment—there are many other things that the claimant would have to show—the burden of proof would be on the claimant. The courts and the Internal Revenue Bureau would always be open to the claimant.

Mr. McCARRAN. I thank the Senator from Nebraska, and also the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, it has been repeatedly stated that if the Senate shall agree to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia on pages 61 and 62 of the bill, it will then be in order to reject the committee amendment on page 58. I think I am able to follow that proposition so far as it goes, but I am not clear as to the effect of rejecting the committee amendment. If the committee amendment which adds material on page 58 shall be rejected, am I to understand that it is the purpose also to reject the committee amendment striking out the language commencing in line 22 on page 57?

Mr. BORAH. That is all part of one amendment. The amendment which we are proposing to strike out is a substitute for the language which appears on the bottom of page 57 and the top of page 58; so that language under this proposal would go out.

Mr. STEIWER. That had not been made clear, Mr. President, but that answers my question.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I regret that we cannot hear the colloquy between the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from Idaho. We should like to hear it.

Mr. BORAH. The understanding of those who drew the amendment was that in case the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia on page 61 should be adopted the language, beginning with section 21, at the bottom of page 57, and including the language on page 58, would be rejected. If that language should not be rejected, the other language would be considered.

Mr. BARKLEY. In other words, if I understand the Senator, the language in subsection 21 which has been stricken out by the committee would be restored and the Senate committee amendment rejected?

Mr. BORAH. No; not restored. The entire section would go out.

Mr. BARKLEY. The House language and the Senate amendment?

Mr. BORAH. Exactly.

Mr. GEORGE. In effect, subsection (d) would become a substitute for subsection (a), beginning with the language on page 57, line 22, down to line 5, on page 59.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, we have been referring to this amendment as appearing on page 58. As a matter of fact, the amendment commences in line 22, on page 57.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the present occupant of the chair, the parliamentary situation is that if the committee amendment on pages 58 and 59 should be rejected, the House language would be reinstated.

Mr. BARKLEY. I raise the parliamentary point that merely rejecting the amendment of the committee would not solve the problem. In addition to that, we should have to reject the original provision in the House bill.

Mr. BORAH. That is understood.

Mr. GEORGE. That is very true.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I regret that I cannot go along with this proposed adjustment of the program. I recognize the motive and spirit of some of the friends of the program in undertaking to adjust it. I have no criticism of anybody. It simply does not meet my views, and I feel that it is my duty so to state.

I am in favor of the committee amendment. It is recognized by every lawyer here who has discussed this question that there exists no right under our system of government for any person to sue the Government unless Congress has given him that right. I think it is recognized by every lawyer in this body that Congress not only has the power to grant that right but it has the power to withhold it, and to withdraw it at any time.

Our entire Federal judicial system, so far as the jurisdiction of the courts is concerned, is based upon and grows out of a grant of jurisdiction by Congress; and unless jurisdiction is granted there is no right in any citizen of this country to bring a suit against the Government in any of the Federal courts.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I have only 15 minutes.

Mr. McCARRAN. I merely wish to make a suggestion which the Senator may use in connection with his discussion. Does the Senator realize that what is involved is not a question of the Government, but a delegation of power that we are now giving to an agency?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I shall proceed with my argument. Let us see whether we are dealing here with highly legalistic ideas, or whether we are dealing with the taxpayers of the country on a basis of fairness and justice to them.

If there is any right of action for the recovery of the processing tax or excise tax, I think practically all of us are in agreement that it is because of the failure of the Congress to make a proper delegation of power to its agents to assess and levy the tax. We undertake to constitute the agent and give the power to levy this tax. There may be some differences about it, but I think the overwhelming judgment is that we had, and now have, the constitutional power to levy this excise tax if it be levied by the Congress, or if the power to levy it be delegated to an agent within proper standards.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. On page 61, the amendment of the committee provides that the claimant must make proof "that he has not included such amount in the price of the article with respect to which it was imposed." Suppose the claimant should say, "No; I did not include it. I sold it at the same price. I would have made that much more if it had been included." How could that question be determined?

Mr. BANKHEAD. There are many ways in which it would absolutely open up the Treasury to all sorts of raids.

Mr. CONNALLY. Of course, Mr. President, if the tax were declared to be unconstitutional I should be in favor of refunding the tax to those who still have their stocks; but where the goods have entered into the channels of commerce and the tax has been passed on, it seems to me it is absolutely impossible to determine the issues which are raised.

Mr. BORAH. Let me say that in such a case the claimant could not recover under this amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY. It would involve the filing of a million claims with the Bureau of Internal Revenue.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, we have the power to levy this tax. If we delegated it to an agent in an irregular or an imperfect way, acting under color of power and authority in our delegation, how has the taxpayer been injured in a really substantial way? Suppose we had made the levy, as we unquestionably had the power to do, would the real substantial rights of the taxpayer be any different than they are merely because the levy was made by our agent, forsooth, under an irregular appointment of the agent? The rights of the taxpayer would be exactly the same as they are today.

We declare in this bill a ratification of the acts of our agent, which every lawyer knows is based upon the elementary principle of ratification by the principal of the acts of his agent, which has been sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States. The claim here is made that the rights, as some Senators believe—and I know they sincerely believe it—of the taxpayer who has absorbed some of his taxes are based upon a pure technicality, upon merely an irregular or imperfect establishment of the power of agency in the matter of defining the delegation of power.

Why should the doors of the Treasury be opened when they would not have been opened if we had levied the tax as we are doing now, as we have the power to do, and as we sought to do in a legal way but failed to accomplish, as possibly may be decided, in an entirely legal way in the matter of the power vested in the agent?

Mr. President, notwithstanding the legalistic theory, notwithstanding the abstract declaration of lawyers here that every citizen should have the right to sue his Government, I say that is not the law of the land. There are many wrongs for which citizens cannot now bring suits against their Government. Even the Court of Claims has a jurisdiction limited to a certain class of claims. The Congress of the United States is open to any citizen who can make a prima facie showing of an injustice or an injury. At every session the committees are passing upon such claims and then referring them by acts of Congress to the Court of Claims. Our doors are not closed. They are open and entered constantly by the people of the country who have grievances against their Government.

But under the proposed program, as I understand, a taxpayer can recover merely because the tax may be unconstitutional, assuming that the act is declared to be unconstitutional, although it was an exercise of constitutional power in an imperfect or an irregular way. Under that program the taxpayer can recover if he did not pass the tax on to the consumer or take it from the producer; in other words, if he did not make a profit out of his business with the tax deducted.

How can that be done? What are we going to do with the packers, the largest class of taxpayers under the law? What are we going to do with their case? There are several hundred millions of dollars involved. They did not pass the tax on. I want to read the testimony of one of their representatives before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, a man by the name of Putnam, representing the Institute of American Meat Packers of Chicago. His official position is economist with Swift & Co. I read:

Senator BANKHEAD. Let me ask you a question there for my own information: You state if the processing tax were eliminated that the price of hogs would immediately increase in the same amount?

Mr. PUTNAM. Yes, sir.

Senator BANKHEAD. I infer from that then that the processing tax was not taken out of the price paid the farmer for the hogs.

Senator CAPPER. I don't see how you figure it any other way. If the price jumps up when you take the processing tax off, certainly the farmer now is paying it.

Senator BANKHEAD. You are correct. The point I want to make is this: Then the consumer is not paying any more on account of the processing tax?

Mr. PUTNAM. He is paying more on account of the present reduction program.

Senator BANKHEAD. I understand, but not on account of the processing tax. If your price to the farmer goes up the same amount as the processing tax, then the packer has the same cost with or without the processing tax, isn't that a fact?

Mr. PUTNAM. Will you restate that, please? I am sorry I did not get it first.

Senator BANKHEAD. I say if the price of the hog goes up the same amount as the processing tax, in the event of the elimination of the processing tax, then the cost to the packer is exactly the same whether they have a processing tax or not?

Mr. PUTNAM. That is correct.

Senator BANKHEAD. And the cost to the consumer is the same?

Mr. PUTNAM. Yes, sir.

Senator BANKHEAD. So the processing tax is not involved in the cost to the consumer, but in the reduction program?

Mr. PUTNAM. Yes; there might have been no processing tax at all, but there might have been an instrument enabling the Government to bring about the same reduction.

Senator CAPPER. Mr. Putnam, you claim that the farmer is not paying the processing tax as the system is now working?

Mr. PUTNAM. A lot of that is sent back to him in the form of a benefit payment.

Senator CAPPER. But the price you pay the farmer for his hog today is less the processing tax?

Mr. PUTNAM. It is the value of the hog for meat purposes, less the processing tax. That is the way it works out.

Under the bill they bring a suit. They prove their right of action by decision of the Supreme Court that the act is unconstitutional, and therefore there was no right to collect that tax, although they paid it voluntarily and without protest. They bring suit and make their proof. Then they show by their records, based upon the cost of the hog, that they did not pass the tax on to the consumer. All right. Then they are asked, "What about taking it out of the producer?" How can that be proved, I ask lawyers in this body?

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask the Senator if he is not a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am, and the Senator from Georgia knows it.

Mr. GEORGE. Let me say to the Senator that the language which he is now criticizing and the provision to which he is making objection are the language and the provision of the committee itself, to which the Senator from Alabama undoubtedly agreed. If it is an impossible condition or an improper condition, Members of the Senate who are not members of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry are in nowise responsible for it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I assume the Senator is talking about the suits brought for taxes hereafter to be paid?

Mr. GEORGE. Both heretofore and hereafter.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Not heretofore. The Senator is proposing to amend the bill so as to make it apply to taxes heretofore collected, but it is not in that section of the bill where it is provided that the taxpayer must make the proof which the Senator is now proposing to require. It was not required. It was the object of the amendment to permit suits by those who had heretofore paid the taxes by making the same proof as those who may bring suit because of taxes hereafter paid.

Mr. GEORGE. It is more unfair as to those who have already paid the tax. They are under no greater hardship, so if the Senator and the Senator's committee thought it proper to impose this provision on the taxpayer of the future and give him notice of it so he could meet it, certainly his argument seems not to be very pertinent when he applies it to the taxpayer who has already acted under the existing law.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The difference, I will say to my very able friend from Georgia, is based upon the fact that this bill has been prepared largely to meet anticipated adverse Supreme Court decisions.

Mr. GEORGE. Suppose it turns out that there is another adverse decision.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Alabama has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will now speak on the bill.

I will say to the Senator from Georgia that we are not assuming that; otherwise we should not be here trying to pass the bill. We are assuming that we have now adjusted and fixed the tax levy so that the same question will not arise, and there will not be a prima facie right to recovery on transactions after the passage of this bill such as existed before the passage of the bill. That is the distinction between the two subjects.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, may I interrupt to ask a question as to the parliamentary status? My understanding is that a request was made, and a necessary request, to reconsider the adoption of the committee amendment on page 61.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I cannot yield for that purpose out of my time. I am not concerned with the parliamentary question.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. ADAMS. My inquiry is whether or not the committee amendment on page 58 has been adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not been adopted.

Mr. ADAMS. Inasmuch as it has not been adopted, as I understand, it does not take unanimous consent to consider this amendment, applicable only to circumstances prior to the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is correct. The amendment was passed over temporarily, and all that is necessary is a vote on the committee amendment on pages 57 and 58.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, going back to the meat packers, as I say, there is no way to show that they passed on this tax. They have claimed that they did not do so. If it shall be undertaken to show that they took the tax out of the producer, the burden of proof will be on them; and the question will arise, What would have been the price if the tax had not been imposed?

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do.

Mr. BYRNES. When a gasoline tax is levied there is an advertisement at the filling station stating "gasoline, so much; tax, so much"; and it is plainly shown that the tax is carried on.

When the manufacturer of cotton bills his cotton to the commission merchant in New York he does not segregate the processing tax from the price of the cotton, but merges it, and bills the cotton goods at a price, say of $100 for a bill of goods.

Do I understand that the manufacturer can claim he paid the processing tax, allege that he did not pass it on—and there will be nothing to show that he did—and be able to collect from the taxpayers the amount of the processing tax which he has already actually passed on and collected from the people?

Mr. BANKHEAD. If he can prove that he did not pass it on, of course the Treasury will pay it back to him.

Mr. BYRNES. He can allege that he did not pass it on. He can show that he billed a certain bill of goods for $100. That $100 would include the processing tax, but it would not be segregated. In the cotton trade, certainly, it was argued in the beginning of the processing tax that the manufacturers should itemize it, and state the cost of the goods, plus the processing tax. They did not do that in the great majority of instances; so they could produce bills showing the cost of goods which really included the processing tax, but if they should allege that it was not included how could the Government controvert that statement?

Mr. BANKHEAD. There would be no way in the world to prove it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is understood that the Senator from Alabama retains the floor. I am about to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, JULY 18, 1935

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Spirit of God, Father of our souls, be pleased to continue Thy ministrations unto us; with gratitude we praise Thee. Give us voices to speak, not for profit but for the poor; not for self but for service. More and more make us men of loyalty, unselfishness, and of industry. O write the word of the ages in our hearts: "The steps of a good man are ordered of the Lord, and he delighteth in his way." Hold us firmly to this truth, for where it is violated the social order falls apart. Father in Heaven, may we hear and may we heed: "God shall bring every work into judgment, whether it be good or whether it be evil." We pray in the name of our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7260) entitled "An act to provide for the general welfare by establishing a system of Federal old-age benefits, and by enabling the several States to make more adequate provision for aged persons, dependent and crippled children, maternal and child welfare, public health, and the administration of their unemployment compensation laws; to establish a Social Security Board; to raise revenue; and for other purposes."

The message also announced that the Senate further insists upon its amendments numbered 17, 67, 68, 83, and 84 to the foregoing bill, asks a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. HARRISON, Mr. KING, Mr. GEORGE, Mr. KEYES, and Mr. LA FOLLETTE to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5917) entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of additional United States judges."

THE SOCIAL-SECURITY BILL

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 7260, the social-security bill, further insist on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, and agree to the conference asked for.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read the title, as follows:

H. R. 7260

To provide for the general welfare by establishing a system of Federal old-age benefits, and by enabling the several States to make more adequate provision for aged persons, dependent and crippled children, maternal and child welfare, public health, and the administration of their unemployment compensation laws; to establish a Social Security Board; to raise revenue; and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

The Chair appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. DOUGHTON, Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL, Mr. CULLEN, Mr. TREADWAY, and Mr. BACHARACH.

COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS

Mr. ROGERS of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Military Affairs may be permitted to sit today and tomorrow during the sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that tomorrow, immediately after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table, I may be permitted to address the House for 7 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the Speaker what is to be the order of business tomorrow?

The SPEAKER. The rule making in order the so-called "Flannagan bill" and also the rule relating to the promotion of officers may be called up.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, there are three rules—the tobacco bill, which was started yesterday, the Mississippi River set-back bill, and the Army promotion bill, and they will probably be called up in that order.

The SPEAKER. And there is also a conference report that may come up. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and include therein a letter received from a representative of the Disabled Peace Time Veterans, and also to include a short poem of three verses.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman asked to include a letter from his constituents. I have thousands of those every day. I do not think we should start on that.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. SNELL. Certainly.

Mr. HOEPPEL. This letter recites the different pensions paid to different kinds of veterans, and I think it would be very informative to Members. The members of the Marine Corps are disregarded.

Mr. TABER. Reserving the right to object, I wonder if the majority leader wants to protect the RECORD.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I feel that I ought to object, I think we ought to eliminate all this correspondence. When we open up the RECORD to correspondence we will have no limitation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. As a member of the Committee on Printing I should do something to protect the RECORD, and if the majority leader will not protect it, I will. I object.

HELP! HELP! HELP! A TREASURY RAID IMPENDS

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, in rising today I wish to voice my opposition to S. 1404, the so-called "officers' promotion bill", which, in my opinion, is a distinct raid on the Treasury of the United States and absolutely at variance with the public interest at this time.

When we consider the plight of our unfortunate unemployed citizens we cannot be loyal to our oath of office by voting to add additional burdens to the taxpayers for a class of individuals already adequately provided for.

It should be borne in mind that the most of the officers who are to be promoted under the provisions of this bill are in receipt of a minimum of $379 per month cash, plus free palatial quarters, plus free dental and medical attention, plus unlimited sick leave and 1 month of annual leave, and in addition, they purchase their subsistence and other stores at Army facilities at from 10 to 40 percent below the prices which other citizens must pay for similar supplies.

The Army officer today is "in clover" as compared to the average technical and professional man. He is riding on the crest of the wave of prosperity inasmuch as he has had no diminution in pay but rather a consistent increase in his pay and allowances since the time he was commissioned. To authorize the retirement of 4,500 able-bodied officers, while we, in the Seventy-third Congress voted to take from the retired list an equal number of war-disabled emergency officers, is a travesty on common sense and justice, as there is no reason why an able-bodied officer with 18 years' service only should receive, on the retired list, from $149.50 to $360 per month while the disabled officer receives only $30 per month for a 30-percent disability.

Not only will the so-called "officers' promotion bill" create additional burdens for the taxpayers and further unbalance the Budget but the retirement provided for able-bodied officers in this bill, after 15 years' service only, is highly discriminatory toward disabled enlisted men of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps.

For the information of the House, I wish to present here certain facts and specific illustrations of the desperate plight of disabled enlisted men. I have in mind, for example, one individual who was wounded on three different occasions in France, the last time most severely. After 23 years of active service, including the Spanish-American War and World War, he was discharged for disability. He is totally disabled and receives only $45 per month pension while, in this bill, we are proposing to provide pensions up to $360 per month for officers who are not disabled and who never saw a battlefield.

Soldiers have never been paid enough so that they could personally assume the hazards of the service. They have always looked to the promises of a pension, if disabled, as a part of the compensation for which they have served. The Government has promised pensions in no uncertain terms and has held these promises before the young men of the country. The Navy, in its recruiting literature, says, "The Navy guarantees a secure future."

Prior to 1933 the enlisted men of the Regular Establishment were pensioned under the old general-pension law enacted in 1862, which, when enacted, covered all soldiers. As time went on and conditions changed, various organized groups of war veterans and of officers secured the enactment of legislation necessary for these groups as times and conditions changed. The Regulars had no organization, and as a result remained behind, not because of any official declaration of inferiority, but simply because they had been left behind in the march of progress. The new deal first affirmatively declared the Regular soldiers to be inferior, and treated them accordingly. This, I maintain, is unjust and unfair and un-American. I speak only for disability pensions and against the discriminations in rates of pensions based on rated degree of disability.

Let me indicate a few of the discriminations. A man totally disabled prior to the Spanish War is entitled to $30 a month, while a man totally disabled subsequent to the Spanish War is entitled to $45 a month. A man injured in the explosion aboard the Maine is entitled to but a small fraction of the pension which a man may draw if he incurred a like disability during war-time enlistment.

A Regular officer may stub his toe and as a result draw a pension of about $400 a month for life, while a Regular enlisted man who is totally disabled and flat on his back is only entitled to $45 a month.

A Regular soldier who contracts TB in the service gets but $45 a month while he is totally disabled with it; however, when his TB is arrested, he is entitled to $22 for 5 years, then $13 a month for 5 years, and nothing thereafter. A man who had a few days service during the World War, and who later contracts TB, gets $100 a month while it is active, and $50 a month for life after it is arrested.

The Regular officers who become disabled in the service are retired at three-quarters pay for life, as are also the enlisted men of the Coast Guard, while the Regular enlisted men of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps are simply discharged, and may apply to the Veterans' Administration for a pension which they may get in the amount of $6 a month if the disability is more than 10 percent or less than 20 percent disabling, and this without regard to the length of the man's service.

Let me mention just a few specific instances of how our old soldiers are treated. John D. McPhail (C–1238030), 26 years and 4 months' service, reduced to $6 a month at the age of 65. Frank Bettencourt (C–1253270) served as a chief petty officer in the Navy from 1895 to 1917, including Battle of Manila Bay, has five good-conduct medals, contracted tuberculosis in service, and in 1933 his pension was reduced from $100 a month to $45 a month, even though he remained totally disabled. Thomas McEvoy, Civilian Conservation Corps camp, Petersburg, Va., discharged for disability after 15 years' service, which disability is not regarded by the Veterans' Administration as sufficiently severe to be even pensionable. This man lost his life career by this discharge. Alex B. Wagner, Blue, Ariz. (C–1137497), served 10 years, including the entire Spanish War, Philippine Insurrection, and Cuban pacification, was getting $30 a month and finally, in despair, committed suicide, willing his pension to the President. Walter E. Richards (C–2446799), injured in Maine explosion in Habana, entitled to $17 a month for 50-percent disability, now gets $30 a month for total disability, nonservice connected.

I could go on indefinitely listing cases, cases which are striking evidence of discrimination and injustice when compared with cases of individuals in other groups who were injured while serving their country. A most flagrant example is that of men of long and faithful service to their country, who, shortly before they would be entitled to retirement, are discharged because of disability, with only a small pension, if any, upon which to live. With old age creeping upon them, their life career gone, and the merest pittance upon which to subsist themselves and families, theirs is indeed a tragic and a desperate plight. That there should be many cases of this type among men of the regular service is, in my opinion, a national disgrace.

Americans who enlist in the regular services at the invitation of their Government are honorable American citizens and are entering upon an honorable career in the service of their Government. There is no reason why they should be so discriminated against when they are disabled while serving their country.

Officers of the Regular Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard, and enlisted men of the Coast Guard are retired at three-quarters pay, regardless of degree of disability, when disabled in the service, and this retirement pay is for life. The enlisted men of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps do not have this right. Note the rank discrimination among these groups; all are American citizens, and all had honorable service.

The Regular enlisted man is now entitled to a pension about 45 percent of that which a war-period enlisted man is entitled to for a like degree of disability. War-period pensions are not for war service, or for service at the front; they are, purely and simply, pensions based on rated degree of service-incurred disability. Large numbers of men who saw a great deal of fighting are not pensionable because they were not disabled in the service. Large numbers of men who saw no real or actual service are pensionable as war veterans. There are no service pensions for World War men, and no pensions based on service at the front. Pensions for World War veterans are not based on the fighting that the individual did, but upon the disability incurred.

Consider for a moment the figures indicating how the new-deal raise of July 1, 1933, affected the men of the Regular Establishment. The figures quoted are from the Veterans' Bureau. On March 20, 1933, the average monthly pension of the Regulars was $19.65. On February 28, 1935, the average had dropped to $18.42, and in this latter figure there is no count made of the men who had been dropped from the pension roll during that period. In other words, the raise they received was in fact a reduction of $1.23 per month, with a great number stricken from the pension rolls entirely.

In order that some semblance of justice in this connection may be given to the enlisted men of the Army and Navy, I propose to introduce the following bill in the Congress within the next day or two to provide for them benefits comparable to those extended to officers disabled after only 1 day of service.

A bill to provide for payment of retired pay or pension for disability incurred in line of duty in the military or naval service of the United States

Be it enacted, etc., that any person who has been discharged or who may hereafter be discharged from the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States for disability, not the result of his own misconduct, and who has had, or who shall have had at the time of such discharge, 10 or more years of honorable service, shall, if he so elects, be paid retired pay equal to three-quarters of the pay he is receiving at the time of discharge, in lieu of a pension based on rated degree of disability.

2. The benefits provided in this act shall not be reduced in amount by reason of the employment or residence of a beneficiary.

3. The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs shall administer the benefits provided herein which shall become effective on the first day of the month following the approval of this act.

I have presented these facts at this time so that the Members of Congress, whom I recognize to be fair-minded, will at least know the discrimination which exists today between two groups of American citizens—that is, able-bodied officers who are so outstandingly well provided for in S. 1404 after only 18 years' of service, and disabled enlisted men, with as much as 29 years' service, who receive only a bare pittance in comparison.

Reserve officers and National Guard officers who become disabled in active service with the Army or Navy in time of peace, are treated with the same lack of consideration as is shown to enlisted men. If a Reserve officer, in active service, is training a young graduate from West Point and both are disabled by an accident in the service to an extent of 30 percent, the Reserve officer will receive $13 per month pension only, while the graduate from West Point will receive three-fourths of the pay of his rank for the balance of his life.

In justice to the worthy Reserve officer and National Guard officer, the General Staff, which appears to be so concerned for the welfare of the Reserve officer and the National Guard officer, should approve of legislation granting retirement benefits to those disabled in line of duty equal to those enjoyed by officers of the Regular service—and in my opinion, such consideration should be extended especially to those disabled as a result of aviation accident. These discriminations against the enlisted man, the Reserve officer, and the National Guard officer should be eliminated by legislation and the War Department should be the first to join in requesting such legislation as a basis of equity and American justice.

HAWAIIAN HOMES COMMISSION

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2965) to amend the Hawaiian Homes Commission Act of 1920, an identical House bill (H. R. 8246) having been reported by the Committee on the Territories, and being now on the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object in order to ask the gentleman from Hawaii a question. As I understand the bill, it is purely a local matter and involves no Federal funds.

Mr. KING. That is correct. It is a reorganization of the Hawaiian Homes Commission, a local affair, a rehabilitation project, which needs congressional action to reorganize. It does not involve any Federal funds.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 202 of an act entitled "Hawaiian Homes Commission Act of 1920", approved July 9, 1921, be amended to read as follows:

"Commission; members, officers, compensation: (a) There is hereby established a Commission to be known as the 'Hawaiian Homes Commission', and to be composed of five members. The members shall be appointed by the Governor and may be removed in the manner provided by section 80 of the act entitled 'An act to provide a Government for the Territory of Hawaii' approved April 30, 1900. All of the members shall have been residents of the Territory of Hawaii at least 3 years prior to their appointment and at least three of the members shall be descendants of not less than one-fourth part of the blood of the races inhabiting the Hawaiian Islands previous to 1778.

"(b) Any vacancy in the office of an appointed member shall be filled in the same manner and under the limitations of this act.

"(c) One of the members shall be designated by the Governor as chairman. An executive officer and such clerical assistants as may be necessary shall be appointed by the Commission to serve at its pleasure. The executive officer shall receive an annual salary not to exceed $6,000 and shall reside habitually at the major Hawaiian Homes Settlement. Clerical assistants shall be paid in accordance with territorial practice for such services. The members of the Commission shall serve without pay, but shall receive actual expenses incurred by them in the discharge of their duties as such members. Of the originally appointed members 1 shall be appointed for a term of 1 year, 1 for a term of 2 years, 1 for a term of 3 years, 1 for a term of 4 years, 1 for a term of 5 years. Their successors shall hold office for terms of 5 years except that any member appointed to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the member whom he succeeds. A member may also be removed by the Governor for cause after due notice and public hearing."

SEC. 2. The Hawaiian Homes Commission Act of 1920 is further amended by adding a new section thereto to read as follows:

"SEC. 224. The Secretary of the Interior shall designate from his Department someone experienced in sanitation, rehabilitation, and reclamation work to reside in the Territory of Hawaii and cooperate with the Commission in carrying out its duties. The salary of such official so designated by the Secretary of the Interior shall be paid by the Hawaiian Homes Commission while he is carrying on his duties in the Territory of Hawaii, which salary, however, shall not exceed the sum of $6,000 per annum."

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

A similar House bill, H. R. 8246, was laid on the table.

SALE OF LAND AT EAGLE PASS MILITARY RESERVATION, TEX.

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2326) to authorize the Secretary of War to sell to the Eagle Pass & Piedras Negras Bridge Co. a portion of the Eagle Pass Military Reservation, Tex., and for other purposes, which I send to the desk. The Senate has passed this bill unanimously and the bill has the unanimous endorsement of the House Committee on Military Affairs. It gives to the Secretary of War authority to dispose of a small tract of land in Eagle Pass, Tex., which was once a cantonment, but now is of no further use to the War Department.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. How much land is there?

Mr. THOMASON. The part of greatest interest is a tract 100 feet by 300 feet, which is the abutment to an international bridge. The remainder of it is desired by the city of Eagle Pass.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object to ask the gentleman a question. The gentleman is a member of the distinguished Military Affairs Committee, and I want to know whether he is aware of the fact that the so-called "promotion bill", which comes on the floor tomorrow, provides for retirement of 4,500 officers and it will entail an expense to the taxpayers of over $12,000,000 per annum. Does the gentleman know that fact?

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against that question.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to sell and convey to the Eagle Pass & Piedras Negras Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, on terms and conditions to be prescribed by the Secretary of War the right, title, and interest of the United States in that portion of the Eagle Pass Military Reservation, Tex., occupied by said company on which its improvements are located.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War is hereby further authorized to dispose of the remainder of said reservation in accordance with and under the applicable provisions and conditions of the act approved March 12, 1926 (44 Stat. 203), and may also include in such disposition that portion of the reservation covered by section 1 of this act, if the Eagle Pass & Piedras Negras Bridge Co. shall not elect to acquire said portion or, having made such election, shall not consummate the purchase or accept tender of the deed and pay the consideration within such time as may be fixed by the Secretary of War.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

TERMS OF DISTRICT COURT, WESTERN DISTRICT OF WISCONSIN

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1309) which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

All causes and proceedings instituted in the court at Superior shall be tried therein, unless by consent of the parties, or upon the order of the court, they are transferred to another place for trial."

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

A similar House bill, H. R. 5573, was laid on the table.

PAYMENT OF GOLD-CLAUSE SECURITIES

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 300, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 300

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 348, a joint resolution authorizing exchange of coins and currencies and immediate payment of gold-clause securities by the United States; withdrawing the right to sue the United States on its bonds and other similar obligations; limiting the use of certain appropriations; and for other purposes. That after general debate which shall be confined to the joint resolution and continue not to exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the joint resolution shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the joint resolution for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the joint resolution and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANSLEY]. All I care to say at this time is that this is a rule for the consideration of the so-called "gold-clause bill." I reserve the remainder of my time and yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL].

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, on June 5, 1933, Congress passed an act to require holders of obligations of all kinds to accept in discharge any lawful or legal tender money of the United States. At that time there were outstanding enormous amounts of obligations, both public and private, payable in gold, according to the contention of the holders of the obligations. There were outstanding over $21,000,000,000 of Government bonds of that type. The Government, of course, was in a very unsatisfactory condition respecting its outstanding obligations and the currency of the country. About half of the outstanding so-called "gold bonds" of the Government have been surrendered and cash or other obligations have been substituted for them. There were outstanding on the 1st of July $10,073,722,250 of these bonds. The validity of the act of 1933 has been questioned in a number of suits that went to the Supreme Court of the United States.

The Supreme Court upheld the validity of that act, insofar as private obligations were involved. There was a suit which involved the validity of the act as it relates to Government obligations. That suit was not sustained, but the Court, in rendering the opinion, rests its decision, at least somewhat, upon the failure of the plaintiffs in action to show that they had been damaged. I think it might be well just at this time to quote from that decision of the Supreme Court. I cannot, in the brief time at my disposal, discuss that decision at length, but I desire to read an extract from the decision referred to.

The Court said:

Plaintiff computes his claim for $16,931.25 by taking the weight of the gold dollar as fixed by the President's proclamation of January 31, 1934, under the act of May 12, 1933 (48 Stat. 52, 53), as amended by the act of January 30, 1934 (48 Stat. 342), that is, at fifteen and five-twenty-firsts grains 0.9 fine, as compared with the weight fixed by the act of March 14, 1900 (31 Stat. 45), or 25.8 grains 0.9 fine. But the change in the weight of the gold dollar did not necessarily cause loss to the plaintiff of the amount claimed. The question of actual loss cannot fairly be determined without considering the economic situation at the time the Government offered to pay him the $10,000, the face of his bond, in legal-tender currency. The case is not the same as if gold coin had remained in circulation. That was the situation at the time of the decisions under the Legal Tender Acts of 1862 and 1863 (Bronson v. Rodes, 7 Wall. 229, 251; Trebilcock v. Wilson, 12 Wall. 687, 695; Thompson v. Butler, 95 U. S. 694, 696, 697).

Before the change in the weight of the gold dollar in 1934 gold coin had been withdrawn from circulation. The Congress had authorized the prohibition of the exportation of gold coin and the placing of restrictions upon transactions in foreign exchange. Acts of March 9, 1933 (48 Stat. 1); January 30, 1934 (48 Stat. 337). Such dealings could be had only for limited purposes and under license. Executive orders of April 20, 1933, August 28, 1933, and January 15, 1934; regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury, January 30 and 31, 1934. That action the Congress was entitled to take by virtue of its authority to deal with gold coin as a medium of exchange; and the restraint thus imposed upon holders of gold coin was incident to the limitations which inhered in their ownership of that coin and gave them no right of action (Ling Su Fan v. United States, 218 U. S. 302, 310, 311). The Court said in that case:

"Conceding the title of the owner of such coins, yet there is attached to such ownership those limitations which public policy may require by reason of their quality as a legal tender and as a medium of exchange. These limitations are due to the fact that public law gives to such coinage a value which does not attach as a mere consequence of intrinsic value. Their quality as a legal tender is an attribute of law aside from their bullion value. They bear, therefore, the impress of sovereign power which fixes value and authorizes their use and exchange. * * * However unwise a law may be, aimed at the exportation of such coins, in the face of the axioms against obstructing the free flow of commerce, there can be no serious doubt that the power to coin money includes the power to prevent its outflow from the country of its origin."

The same reasoning is applicable to the imposition of restraints upon transactions in foreign exchange. We cannot say, in view of the conditions that existed, that the Congress having this power exercised it arbitrarily or capriciously. And the holder of an obligation or bond of the United States payable in gold coin of the former standard, so far as the restraint upon the right to export gold coin or to engage in transactions in foreign exchange is concerned, was in no better case than the holder of gold coin itself.

In considering what damages, if any, the plaintiff has sustained by the alleged breach of his bond, it is hence inadmissible to assume that he was entitled to obtain gold coin for recourse to foreign markets or for dealings in foreign exchange or for other purposes contrary to the control over gold coin which the Congress had the power to exert and had exerted in its monetary regulation. Plaintiff's damages could not be assessed without regard to the internal economy of the country at the time the alleged breach occurred. The discontinuance of gold payments and the establishment of legal-tender currency on a standard unit of value with which "all forms of money" of the United States were to be "maintained at a parity" had a controlling influence upon the domestic economy. It was adjusted to the new basis. A free domestic market for gold was nonexistent.

Plaintiff demands the "equivalent" in currency of the gold coin promised. But "equivalent" cannot mean more than the amount of money which the promised gold coin would be worth to the bondholder for the purposes for which it could legally be used. That equivalence or worth could not properly be ascertained save in the light of the domestic and restricted market which the Congress had lawfully established. In the domestic transactions to which the plaintiff was limited, in the absence of special license, determination of the value of the gold coin would necessarily have regard to its use as legal tender and as a medium of exchange under a single monetary system with an established parity of all currency and coins. And in view of the control of export and foreign exchange, and the restricted domestic use, the question of value, in relation to transactions legally available to the plaintiff, would require a consideration of the purchasing power of the dollars which the plaintiff has received. Plaintiff has not shown, or attempted to show, that in relation to buying power he has sustained any loss whatever. On the contrary, in view of the adjustment of the internal economy to the single measure of value as established by the legislation of the Congress, and the universal availability and use throughout the country of the legal tender currency in meeting all engagements, the payment to the plaintiff of the amount which he demands would appear to constitute not a recoupment of loss in any proper sense but an unjustified enrichment.

Plaintiff seeks to make his case solely upon the theory that by reason of the change in the weight of the dollar he is entitled to $1.69 in the present currency for every dollar promised by the bond, regardless of any actual loss he has suffered with respect to any transaction in which his dollars may be used. We think that position is untenable.

Mr. Speaker, the principle is universally recognized that the sovereign cannot be sued by the subject without its consent. This right of the sovereign is inherent and cannot be nullified except by the sovereign itself. Any consent is, from a legal standpoint, without binding power. It must always be subject to change or revocation. There is nothing that Congress can do that will bind the Government longer than the representatives of the sovereign people of the Nation see fit to continue the force of such action. The insistence on the part of bondholders who have not surrendered their bonds and who are unwilling to abide by the provisions of the act of 1933, involves not only the question of the right to sue the Government, but would assert a right that would nullify the power of the Government to regulate the value of money and to control its currency. If the claims of these bondholders should be sustained, the Government in all good conscience would be compelled to readjust settlements made with other bondholders who surrendered their obligations for legal tender money and to give to all classes of citizens the benefits claimed by the holders of gold bonds. This would result in nullifying the act of Congress of June 5, 1933, to regulate the value of money and maintain the parity of all legal tender currency. Save alone the right to declare war, there is no right of the Government more essential than that of the exercise of its constitutional power to regulate the value of money. That was the right asserted by the Government in the act of June 5, 1933. It is unthinkable that anyone in a position of official responsibility, or that any patriotic citizen would consider any suggestion to nullify this sovereign power of the Government.

In 1887 the Congress passed an act permitting suits against the Government arising out of contracts, such obligations as are involved in the present legislation before the House. That act is the law now. It permits the holder of an obligation to pursue his right in a court of law, up to a certain amount, or to go to the Court of Claims and have adjudication of his claim. That act was passed in 1887. There was not a gold-payment obligation outstanding in the United States at that time. No such thing had been undertaken. No such thing had been proposed. No such thing had been thought of. It was only after the controversy of the 90's and the passage of the act providing for the maintenance of the gold standard, under which $150,000,000 were set up to provide for the redemption of all currency in gold, that any such thought ever occurred to anybody; but there was no thought of confirming the right to sue the Government when such action would negative the right of the Government to control the issuance of currency and to regulate the value of money.

Now, what has happened? Half of these obligations outstanding in 1933 have been surrendered—exchanged for lawful money or other obligations. The remaining holders of gold bonds, if this legislation is not passed—if they succeed in the enforcement of their claims, would collect a premium of approximately $7,000,000,000 on the obligations outstanding, for which that discriminative privilege is demanded. That would not only involve the Government in the expense and annoyance of litigation, and in enormous losses in case of successful litigation on the part of the holders of these obligations, but it would penalize unjustly every citizen of the country who had patriotically submitted to the enforcement of the legislation passed by Congress to regulate the value of money and to control the issuance of currency.

It is said that if this bill passes, the Government will experience embarrassment of its credit. I assert that it is ridiculous to contend that we improve the Government's credit by imposing a burden of $7,000,000,000, for which there is no moral justification, and which, in the case submitted to the Supreme Court, showed no discrimination against the holders of those obligations. Every informed man knows that the gold contracts in this country, whether in Government obligations or imposed upon private citizens, represent the effort of the creditor class to exact payment of their obligations in a particular kind of money, a discriminative favor, which was denied the common citizen of the land whether his obligation rests upon a day's toil or any other kind of debt due him by the Government. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, at the very time this legislation was passed in 1933, the situation in which the Government found itself was that there were $21,000,000,000 outstanding, upon which the bondholders claimed the right to require payment in gold, and yet there was not half that much gold in the whole wide world. In fact, there was in this country less than one-fourth the amount of gold necessary to meet those obligations.

Do we hurt the credit of the Government when we surrender obligations which are impossible of fulfillment and substitute obligations which the Government in its sovereign capacity can discharge any day it sees fit to assert its rights by legislative enactment? The contention is ridiculous.

These men, these bondholders, this favored class who have sought to exact discriminative and unfair treatment or to embarrass the Government of their obligations, demand payment in gold or other obligations to the Government; but when called upon to pay taxes they propose to pay in lawful money, like other citizens. [Applause.]

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER].

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Speaker, I have yet to have explained to me why this bill is referred to as the "gold clause" bill, because at the outset it should be called to the attention of everyone that it removes all the rights of any holder of any Government obligation whatsoever, whether containing a gold clause or not, to recover on his obligation or to recover interest thereon in the event the Government fails to pay. It also takes away the right from every holder of Government obligations, mind you, whether direct obligations or indirect ones—that is, guaranteed ones—to have even a judicial interpretation of his contract with the Government of the United States. In other words, the holder of any obligation of the Government, whether it contains a gold clause or not, the holder of any obligation of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation or of the Farm Credit Administration, which obligations are merely guaranteed by the Government, if this legislation is passed may not go into a court of justice and have the court even interpret his contract.

We are granted under this rule but 2 hours to consider whether or not the United States Government will take another step toward repudiation; 2 hours to discuss a question involving basically our national honor and credit; 2 hours to decide whether we will say to all present and future holders of the obligations of the Government, whether direct or contingent, that they not only cannot recover from the Government in the event it fails to pay, but they cannot even have a judicial interpretation of their contracts.

Is this limitation of 2 hours because we have not sufficient time available? We all know that if the President insists on the passing of a tax bill at this session of Congress we shall soon be marking time and adjourning for 3 days at a time pending action on that bill. There is therefore no question but that we could easily allot to this measure a longer period for consideration.

Is the scant allowance of time because of the insignificance of the issue? If the Members of this House were at all alive to the implications of this legislation every Member would be clamoring to speak.

We are sitting as Members of a Congress which will hold the record as the Congress which passed more unconstitutional legislation than any other in history, and with the passage of this bill and the A. A. A. amendments removing certain rights to sue the Government this Congress will have the added honor of having done more to wreck our three-branch system of government, with its time-tested checks and balances, than any Congress in our history.

We sit here day after day and pass legislation which any competent lawyer knows is unconstitutional, and we do it at the urging of the administration, in callous disregard of repeated warnings from the Supreme Court of the United States. We have seen the legislative power usurped by the executive when a subservient Congress passes with little consideration measures written not, as was once the case, in the committee, but bills brought down here already prepared, and then introduced and railroaded through with little chance for consideration. How many of you chairmen of committees here today know who prepared the bills you have introduced in the last 2 years? How many of you even read them before their introduction? And how many of you, when you vote for them, voted your real convictions?

So much for the abolition of the legislative branch, and now comes the assault on the judiciary. Is it necessary for me to recapitulate the history of the conflict between the new deal and the Supreme Court? First came the hot-oil decision, where the Court, by a majority of 8 to 1, held that it was an improper delegation of authority. Next came the gold-clause decision, where the Supreme Court, by a majority of 8 to 1, held that Congress had no constitutional right to abrogate the gold clause in Government obligations. Next came the Frazier-Lemke Act case, where the Supreme Court unanimously held that act unconstitutional as being a deprivation of property without due process of law. Next came the Humphrey case, where the Supreme Court, by unanimous decision, said that the President of the United States could not through mere whim remove the incumbent of a quasi-judicial or quasi-legislative office. Next came the Schechter-N. R. A. case, where the Supreme Court, by unanimous decision, held that not only was the enforcement of codes under the N. R. A. an unconstitutional exercise of the commerce clause but that it was an unconstitutional delegation of authority. So much for the Supreme Court.

Three days ago the circuit court of appeals in my home city held that the Federal Government had no right of condemnation in slum clearance projects. Two days ago the court of appeals in Boston held certain processing taxes unconstitutional and this was followed up yesterday by another similar decision. It is true the morning paper carries a decision of the court of appeals upholding the right of the T. V. A. to sell excess power, but when the score is added up it is manifest that the new deal will go down in history as a bold attempt to override the constitutional protection of the liberties of the individual.

Notwithstanding the past record of this and the previous Congress, the future is even more alarming. The President has stated that the Guffey bill is on his "must" list. Is there any one here who thinks that this bill is constitutional?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I would rather not yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I merely want to say that here is one Member who believes the Guffey bill will be held constitutional.

Mr. HOLLISTER. I am glad the gentleman has gone on record, for some day he will have to answer for it.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. If the gentleman would read about three pages of Supreme Court decisions he would believe that way too.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield further.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman asked a question. I thought he wanted an answer.

Mr. HOLLISTER. The gentleman has answered me, and I am glad to have his answer.

Is there a good lawyer here who believes that the Wagner bill is constitutional in its application to industry generally? Are there not grave doubts of the social-security bill, and of the utility holding-company bill?

Is not it true that the Attorney General has dodged passing on the Guffey bill, knowing, I suppose, full well that it could not stand up in the courts? Yet the President of the United States, notwithstanding his oath of office to support and defend the Constitution of the United States, has written the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HILL] to urge that no doubt of the constitutionality of that measure should deter the Ways and Means Committee of the House from approving it. What is the Constitution among friends?

Notwithstanding five solemn warnings from the Supreme Court; notwithstanding similar warnings from lower courts, we still pass unconstitutional legislation. And facing the action of the court already taken, and that expected, we now say to the individual, who is always at a disadvantage in fighting for his rights against the overbearing power of government: "We have tried to take away your rights, but we have failed because the Constitution has protected you. We now are going to take away your remedy."

We passed the amendments to the Agricultural Adjustment Act containing provisions taking away the right to sue to recover taxes paid. We are now asked to take away all right to sue on any Government obligation involving the repayment of money, whether with the gold clause, or without it. The Supreme Court held that we could not take away the right, and called it by the ugly name of "repudiation." We now, spurred on by our Chief Executive, who should be leading us in the path of faith and honor, say: "We have failed to take away the right, let us take away the remedy", and 435 members are to be given 2 hours' time to discuss this shameful thing.

From time immemorial governments have provided means by which the claims of their subjects and of others against them might be adjudicated, recognizing that the principle that the sovereign may not be sued without its own consent is not a principle of justice or of equity, but one which is innate in the relationship between the sovereign and the subject. It is a fundamental principle of Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence that a citizen should have some right of redress if his personal or property rights are affected by governmental action, or if his government fails to fulfill a promise to him. If such procedural relief were not granted by the sovereign, no matter how just a claim might be, its value would be a nullity. As Chief Justice Marshall said, in the famous case of Marbury against Madison:

> The Government of the United States has been emphatically termed a "government of laws, and not of men." It will certainly cease to deserve this high appellation if the laws furnish no remedy for the violation of a vested legal right.

The Court of Claims has been in existence for 80 years, set up for the sole purpose of making it possible to proceed directly on a claim against the Government, and in more recent years concurrent jurisdiction, with certain limitation as to amounts, has been given the United States District Court.

The action of Congress, and various Executive orders in pursuance of such action, resulted in the confiscation of gold and gold certificates and in the devaluation on January 31, 1934, of the gold dollar. As a result various suits were instituted against the Government, and on February 18, 1935, in the case of Perry against the United States, 8 of the 9 justices of the Supreme Court declared the joint resolution of Congress of June 5, 1933, unconstitutional to the extent that it impaired the validity of obligations of the United States, although a bare majority of the Court held that since no damage had been shown in the particular case the plaintiff could not recover.

On June 27, 1935, the President sent a message to Congress, the first paragraph of which reads as follows:

> Before the termination of this session of Congress I believe that it is important that definite action be taken to eliminate any uncertainty with respect to the right of holders of gold-clause bonds of the Government to sue for payment either in gold or else in legal tender with an additional sum of 69 cents on every dollar.

On June 28, 1935, House Joint Resolution 339 was filed by the Chairman of the House Banking and Currency Committee. On July 10 and 11 hearings on this bill were held, at which the Attorney General and several representatives of the Treasury Department testified. At the hearing on July 10 an Assistant Attorney General offered to the committee a substitute bill for House Joint Resolution 339, and on July 12 the present bill—House Joint Resolution 348—was reported by a majority of the committee in exactly the form suggested by the Attorney General's office as a substitute for the original bill.

In other words, the highest court of the land having stated that the right could not constitutionally be taken away, we are now asked to remove the remedy. The Court characterized the action which Congress attempted to take in the joint resolution of June 5, 1933, by the ugly word "repudiation." Are we not today considering the taking of another step in respect to repudiation? This bill has been called the "gold-clause suit bill." It should be called the "repudiation bill."

Mr. Chief Justice Hughes, in his opinion in the Perry case, said:

> If the terms of the Government's bond as to the standard of payment can be repudiated, it inevitably follows that the obligation as to the amount to be paid may also be repudiated. The contention necessarily imports that the Congress can disregard the obligations of the Government at its discretion and that, when the Government borrows money, the credit of the United States is an illusory pledge.
> We do not so read the Constitution. * * * In authorizing the Congress to borrow money, the Constitution empowers the Congress to fix the amount to be borrowed and the terms of payment. By virtue of the power to borrow money "on the credit of the United States", the Congress is authorized to pledge that credit as an assurance of payment as stipulated—as the highest assurance the Government can give, its plighted faith. To say that the Congress may withdraw or ignore that pledge is to assume that the Constitution contemplates a vain promise, a pledge having no other sanction than the pleasure and convenience of the pledgor. This Court has given no sanction to such a conception of the obligations of our Government.

He then quoted from the opinion of the Court in the Sinking Fund cases, as follows:

> The United States are as much bound by their contracts as are individuals. If they repudiate their obligations, it is as much repudiation, with all the wrong and reproach that term implies, as it would be if the repudiator had been a State or a municipality or a citizen.

> The binding quality of the promise of the United States is of the essence of the credit which is so pledged. Having this power to authorize the issue of definite obligations for the payment of money borrowed, the Congress has not been vested with authority to alter or destroy those obligations. The fact that the United States may not be sued without its consent is a matter of procedure which does not affect the legal and binding character of its contracts. While the Congress is under no duty to provide remedies through the courts, the contractual obligation still exists, and, despite infirmities of procedure, remains binding upon the conscience of the sovereign.

If we pass this legislation, we are doing exactly what the Supreme Court condemned. We make the credit of the United States "an illusory pledge." We disregard "the highest assurance the Government can give, its plighted faith." The highest court of the land has said that Congress cannot take away the right. Will Congress now accomplish the same result by taking away the remedy?

Surely if there is anything left of faith, honor, and credit to express this proposition is to answer it.

But there is another reason why this bill should not become law in its present form. There are some who feel that, irrespective of the general principles involved, there is something unfair in permitting the holder of a gold bond to secure damages because his bond or its interest coupons are not payable in gold when the holding of gold has become illegal, or in permitting the holder of such a bond to recover more than its dollar face value, or the dollar face value of its coupons. They feel that this smacks of a kind of unjust enrichment, and this was apparently in the mind of the President when he transmitted to Congress the message above referred to.

If that be the case, why is this legislation not limited to such cases? It would have been simple to draft a bill along these lines, and withdraw merely the right to sue or to counterclaim where there was any assertion of damage from confiscation of gold, or the refusal to pay in gold, or where claim was made for more than the dollar face value of an obligation or its interest coupons. Why is it necessary to withdraw such right in all cases where Government obligations to repay money are involved, for such action leaves the holder of such an obligation, whether it be with or without the gold clause, completely without redress, and entirely subject to whatever action the Treasury may choose to take in honoring, or even in interpreting, the terms of all obligations.

It should be noted that this bill affects not only direct Government obligations, but affects as well Home Owners' Loan Corporation bonds, Farm Credit Administration bonds, or any other obligations on which the Government is a guarantor. The question of guaranty, as every lawyer will realize, raises many interesting legal points. If this bill becomes law no holder of an obligation guaranteed by the Government will be able to enforce it against the Government, except according to such interpretations, rules, or regulations as the Treasury Department may see fit to make or to impose.

If this bill becomes law and a dispute should arise between the Treasury and the holder of an obligation as to whether or not a bond has been properly presented for payment, the holder could not even have such a dispute adjudicated, but would be subject without redress to whatever arbitrary rules or regulations the Secretary of the Treasury might make. Many similar cases involving solely questions of interpretation can be suggested—cases which in all justice and equity should be left to the decision of the court.

It must always be kept in mind that even today when recovery is had against the Government in the Court of Claims or the district court, no payment can be made until Congress makes the proper appropriation. Surely Congress can be relied on to refuse appropriations when a plain case of unjust enrichment is involved. Legislation of this nature is utterly unnecessary to guard against the danger of unjust enrichment.

In the hearings on this bill it was suggested that, if such legislation passes, all future obligations of the Government should have a statement on the face of the obligation that no holder would have any redress in the event that the interest on the bond was not paid or that its face value was not paid at maturity. The Government witnesses who appeared smiled at this suggestion, but if a private corporation were issuing obligations where it was known to the issuer that there was no forum in which the obligation could be enforced, such an issuer would be compelled by the provisions of the Securities Act to place such a statement on the face of the obligation.

The Government witnesses stated that it was unthinkable that the Government would not pay its obligations at maturity, or the proper interest thereon when due. It is a question, however, when the delicate psychological factor of credit is involved, whether the passing of legislation of this nature might not ultimately affect seriously the ability of the Government to continue its proper financing. The credit of States and municipalities which have taken advantage of technicalities to avoid the payment of their obligations is always seriously impaired, and their bonds are difficult to market. How many people will extend credit to an individual who deliberately makes himself judgment proof? Is there any reason to have any greater faith in a government which follows the same course?

This bill should not be passed at all, because it is repugnant to all ideas of governmental honor and credit to remove the remedy when the right is admitted. It should certainly not be passed in this form, because its scope is much broader than is required to prevent the recovery on claims arising out of gold confiscation or dollar devaluation. [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 14 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH].

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that those who oppose this legislation have not a correct idea of the issue involved. There is no issue here of repudiation; there is no issue here of any denial of the obligation of a contract made by the Government. The obligation of the Government contract is admitted, it is conceded, and as an evidence that the bond market is thoroughly cognizant of the fact that the Government obligation is conceded, out of the $29,000,000,000 of bonds which the Government owes $20,000,000,000 of them do not contain the gold clause, and of those $20,000,000,000 which have been issued since the 1933 act there has been a constantly heavier oversubscription and a constantly lower rate of interest, until the last bonds were issued at a rate of between 2 and 3 percent.

The issue here is something much broader than the validity of a Government obligation. Those whose conception of money is something which is to be traded in by speculators, whose conception of money is something which can be used for the purpose of a particular class to absorb the wealth of the country by a manipulation of the currency, do not like the bill; to that class, which has never understood that the money of the country is the people's medium of exchange, is the means whereby the people can distribute goods and services, this legislation is unwelcome, because it undertakes to proclaim the doctrine that from now on we will have a currency which is uniform in value. If there was no other justification for the legislation than that, it would be amply justified. And let me say to those of you who have been fed up by the metropolitan press upon the necessity for international stabilization of the currency of the country, that the passage of this bill, insofar as the internal economy of the country is concerned, will go a long way to stabilize the currency.

Who ever heard of a stable government repudiating its obligations? Who can conceive of a Secretary of the Treasury rendering himself certain of impeachment by refusing to pay the Government obligations as he is ordered to do? If your Government is not stable, if your Government is unable to pay its debts, what good is a decision of the courts of that Government that the debt should be paid? It is a mere idle gesture; but the purpose of this legislation is to keep people who are speculating with the people's money out of the Federal courts. The purpose of this legislation is to keep nonproducers from fattening on the production of the producers of this country through applying to the courts. As was said to you by the great chairman of this committee, those who oppose this legislation think it is all right for the bondholder to be enriched an extra 69 cents on every dollar that he has loaned. The amount on this $9,000,000,000 would be, as he said, nearly $7,000,000,000. There is no reason for the opposition to this legislation except that those who have for so long been able to manipulate the money of the country, those who have for so long been able to control the amount of money that should be in circulation, those who for so long have been able to forestall the obligation of the Congress to coin the people's money and regulate its value, see their power slipping away. That is what is the matter, and that is all that is the matter. [Applause.]

Everybody knows, who has any judgment about it at all, that the money issued by the Government of the United States is the best money in the world, and that it makes no difference what it is, whether a piece of paper or a bit of metal. Money is anything which facilitates the exchange of goods and services. Money is not something which should be made out of a yellow metal or a white metal or some other metal. That is a superstition, a superstition perpetuated by a class whose interest it is to have money as scarce as possible and to cost as much as possible. Whenever anything is undertaken in this House in the interest of the masses of the people, it makes no difference what form the legislation may take, there is always an effort to show some fictitious calamity that will arise from the passage of the proposed legislation. I shall never forget when I was a law student, going into the court of common pleas in Baltimore City one day when Mr. William Walsh, of Cumberland, was trying a very important damage suit against the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. At that time the chief stockholder of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad was Robert Garrett, and when the attorney for the railroad company began to argue the railroad company's case he said, "Gentlemen of the jury, let me call your attention to the terrible losses that will accrue to the widows and orphans who own the stock of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad", when Mr. Walsh, in his high-pitched voice, said, "Robert Garrett is the orphan boy; who is the widow woman?" [Laughter.]

Nobody can suffer, no bondholder, under this legislation, can fail to get dollar for dollar in purchasing power for every dollar he loaned unless this Government of ours is destroyed. This Government of ours will be perpetuated through ages yet unborn as a blessing to all mankind if we can only get back to the understanding that the people's medium of exchange belongs to the people, that it should be uniform in value, and that no class shall control its issuance but that it shall be issued only for the benefit of everybody. [Applause.]

There is one other thing I want to emphasize. In the minority report the statement is made that this legislation may make it difficult to finance the Government, to sell Government bonds. Of course, from my standpoint an argument of that kind is not even entitled to discussion, because it has no validity. The value of Government bonds will not be injured at all. But let me tell you this: Under the present condition the Government, which has everything, borrows money from the banks, which have nothing except the credit they get from the stability of the Government, and then loans the money back to the banks in the shape of deposits and proceeds to pay interest on it. Why and how does money issued by the banks on the Government credit have any more validity or any more value than money issued by the Government itself? The Government of the United States is not dependent upon the banks for its financing. The banks' capital, surplus, and undivided profits amount to only $7,000,000,000. They have loaned much more than that to private interests. They have not got a cent to loan to the Government, except bookkeeping money. We have given them $13,000,000,000 in the last 10 years that has not cost them a single cent except what it costs for some clerk to put the amount on the books.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] has expired.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous quesion was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 348) authorizing exchange of coins and currencies and immediate payment of gold-clause securities by the United States, withdrawing the right to sue the United States on its bonds and other similar obligations, limiting the use of certain appropriations, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 348, with Mr. WHITTINGTON in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the resolution.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the resolution be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CROSS].

Mr. CROSS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, this is very much the same fight we had here in 1933. You hear much about repudiation. The money of a country is its financial lifeblood, and every government in the world has the sovereign power to regulate its financial lifeblood. There is no government that permits itself to be dictated to in the matter of coining and regulating the value of its money. The act that we are trying to get rid of here today was granted as an act of grace but with no thought its monetary policy would be attempted to be controlled as the result of such act. Those who want to come in and sue the Government, use its courts as a knife to cut a pound of flesh from its heart, are surely not acting as patriots. If there were Communists in this hall, if there were Benedict Arnolds here, they would vote, with glee, against this bill. But if Jefferson were here, if Andrew Jackson were here, if Abe Lincoln were here, if Teddy Roosevelt were here, you would find them lining up back of this bill.

I cannot understand the mental virus that actuates those who fight this measure.

Now, let us look at it for a moment. The Constitution says it is the duty of the Congress to regulate the value of money. Every time the Government issues a bond, the person who buys that bond buys it with the understanding that Congress can come in, under the Constitution, and regulate the value of the money they will receive back. Strange to say, the value of the dollar today, when measured by the true standard, though it contains but 13.7 grains of gold instead of 23.22 grains of gold, will buy more of all the things that go to feed and supply the necessities, comforts, and luxuries of men, than the dollar they put out when it contained 23.22 grains of gold.

That is why the Constitution said the Congress should have the right to regulate the value of the dollar, knowing that conditions would come about when the value of so many grains of gold or silver, as at that time, would fluctuate violently up and down. As a result of the World War and the great crash that followed that war, and the scramble for gold, its purchasing power trebled. Its value therefore trebled. So the Congress, under the Constitution, is called upon to perform its duty and regulate the value of the dollar and bring it down to somewhere near the value that it had before the crash that justice might be done between debtor and creditor. So, in regulating its value we have put 13.7 grains in the dollar in the place of 23.22, and even so, the purchasing power of the dollar is far greater than it was when the dollar contained 23.22 grains of gold.

Oh, they say, "Repudiation!" If this be repudiation, then the Constitution is a constitution of repudiation, because that is where the authority is found and which protects the interests of the people by commanding Congress to regulate the value of the dollar when it skyrockets out of all reason as it did as a result of the world depression.

If this line of argument be correct, the fellow who buys a $10,000 Government bond would have the right, just because the Government acting within its constitutional power reduced the number of grains of gold in the gold dollar by 40 percent, he would have the right to come in and say, after he gets his $10,000 on the present basis of 13.7 grains of gold to the dollar: "I demand $4,000 more." This man who purchased the Government bond knew at the time he purchased it that under the Constitution this Congress has the duty of regulating the value of the dollars he is to get back. The Government does not and cannot make contracts which can rob it of its sovereign power over money.

If you say the holder of this $10,000 Government bond, besides being paid $10,000 in present dollars, can collect $4,000 more, then the holders of private bonds, mortgages, deeds of trust, municipal bonds, school bonds, and road bonds have an equal claim, because there is on the statute books the act passed on March 14, 1900, by Congress which said that the value of the dollar should be 23.22 grains of gold, and that law said that all dollars should have the same value. While this law was on the statute book, every individual who holds a deed of trust can claim that statute as a guaranty to him by the Government that he was to get dollars containing 23.22 grains of gold. If he can assert this claim, it means that the Government must pay an additional 40 percent; that he has the right to sue the Government and get 40 percent over and above what he collects from the mortgagors.

I just communicated with the Treasury Department. They advised me that there are outstanding in private bonds, deeds of trust, and similar obligations about $100,000,000,000. Some seem to want to see a situation whereby those men could get judgment against the Government for $40,000,000,000, because they would point to the statute and say: "Here is what you said: 'That all dollars had to be equal, each worth 23.22 grains of gold. You have given it to the man who held the Government bond. I stand in equally as good a position.'" No court could stand against that line of reasoning and argument, and you would have forced on this Nation an additional debt of $40,000,000,000. The $10,000,000,000 of gold-clause bonds yet outstanding would mean an additional $4,000,000,000; so $44,000,000,000 would be added to the present debt of $30,000,000,000 and make the total debt $74,000,000,000, and that would wreck your country. That is what the Benedict Arnolds would have done; that is what Communists would like to see done; but that is not what patriots would like to see done.

England devalued her pound when she was on the gold standard; she devalued her pound time and time again until finally it got down to where it contained only 113 grains of gold when she went off the gold standard, but whoever heard of any person going into a court of England and daring to sue the sovereign power of England on a claim that they had been damaged as a result of such devaluation? Every civilized country in Europe has devalued its money. France about 80 percent, Belgium about 90 percent, Italy about 75 percent; yet who ever heard of anybody attempting to sue the sovereign of any of these countries? No; old England is a land of patriots; no Englishman would dare attempt such a thing.

The dollar today is greater in value, the 13.7-grain dollar will buy more land, more houses, more of everything that goes to feed, clothe, and supply the necessities and luxuries of life than would the dollar originally given by the present holders of bonds, mortgages, and deeds of trust. It is a Shylock proposition. Not only does he want to cut off the pound of flesh, but he wants to plunge the dagger in and take out the heart. I could never let partisanship carry me away on a question where patriotism is so greatly needed. Why, I know what is going to be the result on the roll call. Lots of my friends over here on the Republican side are going to vote right; some of them will not. You know I sometimes get puzzled. Some of the dearest friends I have are right over here. I love you boys, and off this floor you are wonderful, but when you come here and get on this side of the aisle immediately you begin to look like that almost extinct animal called the elephant, you begin to have a long snout, an ivory head, and little beady eyes, and all your reason seems to evaporate, and I become so vexed I would kick you, but with two tails swinging around I cannot tell which end to kick. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. CAVICCHIA].

Mr. CAVICCHIA. Mr. Chairman, the new-deal doctors are offering us a sugar-coated pill which hides bitterness and disappointment. The ingredients of the pill are iniquity, repudiation, and shamelessness; and the whole has been labeled "The public interest."

The world was shocked in 1914 when the Imperial German Chancellor said that the treaty to respect Belgium neutrality was a mere scrap of paper. For years the American sense of justice has been outraged by the failure of our debtor nations to meet their obligations to the United States Government. The resolution before us, if passed, will entitle Uncle Sam to a membership card in the international union of debt dodgers; and what American will dare criticize the defaulting debtor nations after this resolution is passed?

The distinguished chairman of this committee in his speech this morning said that a loss to the Government of $7,000,000,000 will occur unless we assert our sovereign right and pass this bill.

The chairman also said before the committee that the question of morality did not disturb him in view of the treatment we have received from other countries. (See p. 6 of the hearings.)

This makes for the contention that two wrongs make one right. I for one will not subscribe to any such doctrine.

The Attorney General says it is within the sovereign power to undo any contract with its citizens in the public interest. Senators GLASS and MCADOO both disagree with the Attorney General, and these gentlemen disagree as to what Chief Justice Hughes meant in the gold-clause case. I wish I could find it as easy as the Attorney General does to say that this is a just law. The Chief Justice said:

> The Constitution empowers the Congress to fix the amount to be borrowed and the terms of payment. The Congress is authorized to pledge that credit as an assurance of payment as stipulated as the highest assurance the Government can give its plighted faith. To say that Congress may withdraw or ignore that pledge is to assure that the Constitution contemplates a vain promise.

That is what the Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court said.

If the Attorney General can find comfort in those words, he is welcome to it.

A few weeks ago a bill urged for passage by the Secretary of the Treasury was before the House empowering the Treasurer to pay the Philippine Islands on $20,000,000 deposited in this country the difference between the old and the new dollar, clearly recognizing the fact that injustice would result if the $20,000,000 was paid in new coins or in devalued dollars. The Republic of Panama is insisting on being paid $250,000 due it under the treaty in former gold dollars, and the Attorney General says it is a just claim on the part of Panama, because the treaty calls for payment in gold of certain weight and fineness. (See p. 5 of the hearings.)

The gold bonds of the United States Government promise to pay in gold of certain weight and fineness; yet we are told that we may welch on this promise to save the American taxpayer. In other words, the Attorney General, in effect, says that it is perfectly ethical to make fish of some and fowl of others.

Is it worth $7,000,000,000 to you to repudiate the solemn promise of the American Government? To me the honor of America has no limit as far as money is concerned. I am for the Constitution and for the payment as promised, and I want the right left to the courts to hear any citizen who feels he is unjustly treated. I for one am satisfied with a democracy such as we have today and do not want a dictatorship.

The Constitution says that "Congress shall regulate", but does not say "it may repudiate."

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CROSS] said that Communists and Benedict Arnold would vote with those who are opposed to this measure, and that Lincoln and Theodore Roosevelt would vote with those who favor its passage. I am sorry that the delightful gentleman from Texas did not give his authority for his statement, unless he is a spiritualist and has been in touch with Lincoln and Theodore Roosevelt.

If it is treason for me to urge that we, as a Nation, keep our plighted word, let it be treason and let them make the best of it.

Mr. Chairman, if the Congress heretofore has made a mistake in promising to pay in gold of a certain weight and fineness, correct that mistake by making no more promises of that kind, but for heaven's sake keep the promise that we have made. [Applause.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SPENCE].

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, questions of a moral nature usually produce much feeling. However, in my opinion, there is no moral question involved in this bill. It is merely a question of what should be the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims.

One of the attributes of sovereignty is immunity from suit. The power to regulate the value of money is a governmental power of the highest character. The moral question is behind us when the gold dollar was devalued. That is an assured fact. It was done in the exercise of a governmental function. The only question now presented is whether some men may become enriched because of the action of the Government in the attempt to preserve its institutions and for the protection of its people. After all, in the last analysis, what is the Government of the United States? The Government of the United States is the people of the United States. If you give an undue privilege or an undue advantage to one class of people, you impose a burden on the other classes not so favored.

Mr. Chairman, what is the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims? Why was it established and what is its purpose? The Court of Claims has jurisdiction, first, of all claims—except for pensions—founded upon the Constitution of the United States or any law of Congress, upon any regulation of an executive department, upon any contract, express or implied, with the Government of the United States, or for damages, liquidated or unliquidated, in cases not sounding in tort, in respect of which claims the party would be entitled to redress against the United States either in a court of law, equity or admiralty if the United States were suable. Provided, however, that nothing in this section shall be construed as giving to the said court jurisdiction to hear and determine claims growing out of the late Civil War, and commonly known as "war claims."

The Republican Party did not think there was any moral obligation involved in refusing the right to sue for claims growing out of the Civil War.

Then there is the authorization with reference to set-offs and the provision with reference to disbursing officers.

There is another provision which has reference to the functions of the Court of Claims:

Whenever any bill, except for a pension, is pending in either House of Congress providing for the payment of a claim against the United States, legal, or equitable, or for a grant, gift, or bounty to any person, the House in which such bill is pending, may, for the investigation and determination of facts, refer the same to the Court of Claims, which shall proceed with the same in accordance with such rules as it may adopt and report to such House the facts in the case, and the amount, where the same can be liquidated, including any facts bearing upon the question whether there has been delay or laches in presenting such claim or applying for such grant, gift, or bounty, and any facts bearing upon the question whether the bar of any statute of limitations should be removed or which shall be claimed to excuse the claimant for not having resorted to any established legal remedy, together with such conclusions as shall be sufficient to inform Congress of the nature and character of the demand, either as a claim, legal or equitable, or as a gratuity against the United States, and the amount, if any, legally or equitably due from the United States to the claimant. If it shall appear to the satisfaction of the court upon the facts established, that under existing laws or the provisions of this chapter, the subject matter of the bill is such that it has jurisdiction to render judgment or decree thereon, it shall proceed to do so, giving to either party such further opportunity for hearing as in its judgment justice shall require, and it shall report its proceedings therein to the House of Congress by which the same was referred to said court.

How are the judgments of the Court of Claims enforced? The judgments of the Court of Claims are not enforced by execution. When you get a judgment in the Court of Claims you are not entitled to execution upon the capital of the Nation or the Treasury Department of the United States.

All the Court of Claims does is to report to the Congress of the United States and it is then within the bounty and conscience of the Congress whether the claims will be paid.

The failure to pass this bill would be but another delegation of the legislative power of the Congress to establish a monetary policy and transfer that power to the Court of Claims.

What judicial question is involved here? What facts would they try? What issues would be presented to the Court of Claims? Do we not know the indisputable facts as well as the Court of Claims could possibly ever know them? Are we not in possession of all the facts in reference to the issue of the public negotiable instruments of the Government of the United States?

What fact will the Court of Claims try? The Court of Claims would merely try a political question. They would merely render a judgment upon a policy of the United States, a policy that we can act upon or not, as we deem advisable.

What is the procedure after you get a judgment in the Court of Claims? They report the claims to the Congress under the section which provides:

Reports of the Court of Claims to Congress, if not finally acted upon during the session at which they are reported, shall be continued from session to session and from Congress to Congress, until the same shall be finally acted upon.

Section 248, Judicial Code, title 28, provides:

On the first day of every regular session of Congress the clerk of the Court of Claims shall transmit to Congress a full and complete statement of all the judgments rendered by the Court during the previous year, stating the amounts thereof and the parties in whose favor they were rendered.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPENCE. I yield.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I presume the gentleman would grant that the ascertainment of the question whether the complainant had suffered a loss would be one of a judicial nature which might be determined by a court, such as the Court of Claims, but one which the Congress of the United States would not be qualified to determine.

Mr. SPENCE. I do not think so at all, because it would not be based upon facts of a private nature. The facts are of a public nature and peculiarly in the possession of Congress.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I think it would be dependent on the facts in each case as to whether or not the person had suffered a loss.

Mr. SPENCE. I think not. The facts would be the same in all the cases. It would decide a question of public policy.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. And, furthermore, is not the fact that the Congress would have to make an appropriation to pay the loss, if any loss were found, a sufficient protection to the taxpayers of the United States against the possibility that someone would assert his rights for purposes of self-enrichment?

Mr. SPENCE. I concede that the gentleman's position would be perfectly sound if the facts upon which the cases were founded were facts of a private nature and were not publicly known.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. If the gentleman please, the Supreme Court said in its decision that in order to recover the plaintiff would have to show his own peculiar damage, which he certainly could not do before the Congress of the United States.

Mr. SPENCE. But his own peculiar damage is the damage of a class. His own peculiar damage would be the damage of every man so situated in the United States.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Not necessarily so. This Congress has already recognized the fact that the people of the Philippines and Panama and our representatives in foreign countries are suffering a peculiar damage which a citizen of the United States does not suffer.

Mr. SPENCE. I do not yield further, but I understand that the Philippine funds were owned by the Philippine government and deposited in banks of the United States to the credit of the Philippine government and that they were the owners of that distinctly earmarked fund.

I have here a decision of the Court of Claims, cited with approval by the Supreme Court of the United States, which states:

The Court of Claims was established to relieve Congress, to protect the Government by regular investigation, and to benefit claimants by affording them a certain mode of examining and adjudicating on their claims, and the court must hear and determine claims founded on any law of Congress, on any regulation of an executive department, or on any contract, express or implied, with the Government.

It is my contention it would be a futile thing to submit to the Court of Claims a case where the facts are as well known to every Member of the Congress as they would be to the Court of Claims and to allow the Court of Claims, by its judgment, to say what shall be the monetary policy of the United States, a matter entirely within the discretion of the Congress. [Applause.]

In Perry against The United States, the Supreme Court, speaking of the gold clause, said:

This obligation must be fairly construed. The "present standard of value" stood in contradistinction to a lower standard of value. The promise obviously was intended to afford protection against loss. That protection was sought to be secured by setting up a standard or measure of the Government's obligation. We think that the reasonable import of the promise is that it was intended to assure one who lent his money to the Government and took its bond that he would not suffer loss through depreciation in the medium of payment.

The Government states in its brief that the total unmatured interest-bearing obligations of the United States outstanding on May 31, 1933, which it is understood contained a "gold clause" substantially the same as that of the bond in suit, amounted to about $21,000,000,000. From statements at the bar it appears that this amount has been reduced to approximately twelve billions at the present time, and that during the intervening period the public debt of the United States has risen some seven billions, making a total of approximately twenty-eight billion five hundred million, by the issue of some $16,500,000,000 of "non-gold-clause obligations."

And further along the Court said:

The question of damages. In this view of the binding quality of the Government's obligations, we come to the question as to the plaintiff's right to recover damages. That is a distinct question. Because the Government is not at liberty to alter or repudiate its obligations, it does not follow that the claim advanced by the plaintiff should be sustained. The action is for breach of contract. As a remedy for breach, plaintiff can recover no more than the loss he has suffered and of which he may rightfully complain. He is not entitled to be enriched. Plaintiff seeks judgment for $16,931.25, in present legal-tender currency, on his bond for $10,000. The question is whether he has shown damage to that extent, or any actual damage, as the Court of Claims has no authority to entertain an action for nominal damages.

It was decided in this action that the plaintiff was not entitled to $1.69 for every dollar promised by his bond regardless of actual loss, and this suit is a fair indication of the character of suits the Government will be compelled to defend and the manner in which it will be harassed should the holders of Government securities be permitted to sue in the Court of Claims.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD].

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, 2 years ago, May 29, 1933, I was suffering from illness and was not present during the debate. I read the debate carefully and have reread it this morning. After more than 2 long years I should like to have more than 10 minutes to comment on its effect; and, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. GIFFORD. It was declared to be a new declaration of independence on the other side. They prophesied that business would immediately improve greatly. Many Members on this side declared that the opposite would happen.

I leave it to the judgment of the Members of this House whether the act of repudiation at that time has brought about confidence and great improvement in business.

Many object to have a bill presented with a lot of "whereases" in it. I claim that these "whereases" are more apologetic than explanatory, attempting to tell the Supreme Court, perhaps, the reason why they think the bill is constitutional.

You have probably read these many "whereases", but I want to talk about this particular one:

Whereas no holder of any of the money or securities of the United States has suffered any damage because of the measures heretofore taken to maintain such security and equality of advantage—and any speculative holding of or dealing in the money or securities of the United States to take advantage of the Government's fixed policy to continue such certain and uniform treatment is incompatible with the public interest.

That is false—

They are trying to bolster this act by this plainly inaccurate statement. The Supreme Court has something to say about that. Mr. Chairman, I wish to read the Court's reference to this matter. My words will have little or no effect, but the words of the Supreme Court will go ringing down for years to come. I quote:

These bonds are held by men and women in many parts of the world; they have relied upon our honor. Thousands of our own citizens of every degree, not doubting the good faith of their sovereign, have purchased them. It will not be easy for this multitude to appraise the form of words which establishes that they have suffered no appreciable damage; but perhaps no more difficult for them than for us. And their difficulty will not be assuaged when they reflect that ready calculation of the exact loss suffered by the Philippine government moved Congress to satisfy it by appropriating, in June 1934, $23,862,750.78 to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

You can try to explain that no losses to individuals obtain; you can attempt to explain the Panama Canal business; you may try to explain the recoupment by the Philippine Islands; but go back home and try and convince the people at home that we are in as favorable a position as are the foreign countries in this matter if you can.

Glance at the hearings on pages 28 and 29, where I interrogated the witnesses, and see how they attempted to explain this item relating to loss in particular cases.

The intent was that when we devalued the dollar, prices would go up 49 percent, practically immediately. It could not be done any more than if you cut the yardstick and the pound 40 percent; the people would get more yards or pounds, because the effects of devaluation would not be immediate. There will be men on the floor here today who will be glad to confess that the result was not what they anticipated. How foolish to say no individuals met any loss by the devaluation. I have suggested, although it is controverted, that raw cotton selling at 6 cents, went almost immediately to 11 cents, causing losses to many. If a manufacturer of cotton had agreed to deliver cotton goods at a certain price he might have lost considerable money by being forced to pay 11 cents, having based sale on a cost of 6 cents. Of course, he had a loss of the amount between 6 and 11 cents.

Did not the foreigner owning a bond suffer a loss? Their answer was that he would not if he came over here and used the money. He should not be obliged to come over here and use the money. Did not we pass a law here to recoup our own officials who suffered such hardships because of the depreciation of our dollars in foreign countries? They could not buy as much within 49 percent as they did before we passed the act relieving them. I repeat that particular "whereas" is false and should be stricken from the act.

I shall preserve for my scrapbook, together with other cherished literature of the happenings this year, certain portions of the Supreme Court's decision which I will now quote.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Not now. The Supreme Court said:

The United States are as much bound by their contracts as are individuals. If they repudiate their obligations, it is as much repudiation, with all the wrong and reproach that term implies, as it would be if the repudiator had been a State or a municipality or a citizen.

If an individual should undertake to annul or lessen his obligation by secreting or manipulating his assets with the intent to place them beyond the reach of creditors, the attempt would be denounced as fraudulent, wholly ineffective.

Under the challenged statutes it is said the United States have realized profits amounting to $2,800,000,000. But this assumes that gain may be generated by legislative fiat. To such counterfeit profits there would be no limit; with each new debasement of the dollar they would expand. Two billions might be ballooned indefinitely—to 20, 30, or what you will.

Loss of reputation for honorable dealing will bring us unending humiliation; the impending legal and moral chaos is appalling.

This condition may be brought about by an act of the Government, yes; but we have a minority report signed by all the members on the minority side of the committee. There will be few Republicans who will vote for this repudiation in spite of what the gentleman just said. No; we may not call it an act of a government, but we may call it a law of this administration, and let you bear the full responsibility for it.

The minority will be augmented later, when more conscientious policies will be followed, and when the word "repudiation" will not be thrown in our faces.

Let us talk of England for a moment. Mr. Beck, of Pennsylvania, told you when this act was passed on May 29, 1933, that that act of repudiation was the last straw, and that England, who prided herself on her honor relating to financial transactions, would when next June came around repudiate, while up to that time she had paid. That prophecy came true. Repudiation was a word which the majority and the witnesses before the committee tried to avoid, but the Supreme Court had used the term in their opinion. They fairly cursed the transaction; and no matter what we may say, their words will remain.

Mr. Chairman, I suggest that everyone interested should read the arguments made for and against this act on May 29, 1933, and note the prophecies made and determine whether the Democratic side of the House or this side of the House prophesied correctly. Gentlemen on this side will be proud to read their record vote at that time. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, some Members on the majority side have seen fit to inject partisanship into the discussion of this resolution. It is true that the minority members of the Banking and Currency Committee have signed a unanimous minority report against the resolution, believing that it amounts to repudiation; but at the outset of my remarks I want to call attention to the fact that two former Democratic Secretaries of the Treasury—Mr. GLASS and Mr. McADOO—have also stated in the public press that this withdrawal of the right of an American citizen to file a suit for damages in the Court of Claims is repudiation.

I do not believe that any Democrat on the majority side wants to read out of their party these two distinguished former Secretaries of the Treasury, who ought to know at least as much about the pending resolution as some of the speakers on the Democratic side today. Both of these former Democratic Secretaries of the Treasury ought to know from actual experience more about the gold clause, and particularly about the justification of the Government to withdraw the right of bondholders to sue the Government for damages, than any single Member of the House of Representatives. Partisanship or no partisanship, I prefer to take their opinion as to what constitutes repudiation than several of the gentlemen who have just expatiated with so much vehemence.

This is not a partisan issue. It is either repudiation or it is not repudiation. We believe it is repudiation. Furthermore, we believe that this resolution constitutes a very improper proceeding, a very dangerous one, because it is likely to impair the credit of the United States. It does not merely apply to what has gone on in the past. That is bad enough. That is repudiation in itself, but it says in any future issues of securities the holder cannot sue. It means that he has no rights; that future Government securities are merely scraps of paper that can be repudiated and violated at will by the Government. Therefore I say why should anyone buy Government bonds, when they can be deliberately repudiated as the gold clause has been, but much more easily because there will be no gold clause or any other restraining provision.

In the future, Government securities will be mere scraps of paper, open to immediate repudiation, not by act of Congress, which is at least a restraining influence, but they will be subject to repudiation by the Secretary of the Treasury. In my humble opinion, the resolution amounts to legalized financial immorality, financial rape, and financial robbery. Its very purpose is to legalize an immoral act of Congress. It deliberately goes a step further than the repudiation of the gold clause. What did the Supreme Court say in the case of the gold clause? Eight of the nine judges said that the act of Congress, Public Resolution No. 10, of June 5, 1933, "is unconscionable and immoral." That is what 8 of the 9 judges said, but by a vote of 5 to 4 they held it is legal unless the bondholder could show damages. In order to prove damages the bondholder must have the right to go to court and sue the Government.

Now, you come into Congress to take away this inherent right of an American citizen to sue the Government. Up to 1855 the Congress settled claims against the Government, but there was so much graft and dissatisfaction that the Congress itself relinquished that right and established the Court of Claims. Ever since 1855 American citizens could go with their cases before the court and sue the Government. That has been the customary practice for 80 years in the United States, and all other civilized nations permit their citizens to sue their governments. The Congress, after decisions are handed down by the Court of Claims has invariably appropriated the money. Now, you come here and deliberately add repudiation to repudiation. Not only has the gold clause been thrown out of the window but now the right to sue, an almost sacred right, is taken away from American citizens who cannot even go into the Court of Claims and sue for damages.

Let me answer the statement of a Democratic member of our committee. I love them all. I may disagree with them at times, but the gentleman said on the floor of this House that Communists would advocate the position taken by the minority opposition. I have heard something about Communists myself. [Laughter and applause.] I know a little something about Communists. The one thing for which Communists stand more than anything else is repudiation. [Applause.] Lenin, who is the leader of communistic thought all over the world, a great intellectual and a very shrewd man, always said the way to bring about communism in the world, in civilized and capitalistic countries, is to depreciate the value of money, to impair credit, and to repudiate all money values. That is exactly what this bill tends to do.

It is carrying out the principles laid down by Lenin himself to impair credit, to depreciate money, to take away the rights of the people to sue, and, above all, to bring about repudiation. That is the essence of communism—to destroy financial credit and currency—and the method is repudiation. This is just another link in the chain of state socialism, making the Government the master of the people and placing complete control of money in the hands of a dictatorial government. This resolution amounts to repudiation; it is repudiation. I do not say that on my own account or on the account of my colleagues on the Republican side. The elimination of the gold clause was repudiation, and held by the Supreme Court of the United States to be an immoral act. This is doubly immoral, because it takes away the right of the people to sue the Government in defense of their own rights and of their own liberties.

Above all and beyond everything else, the reason I am opposed to this bill is that it destroys public confidence in America and further impairs the public credit. That is the main objection to it. What we need is inflation of confidence, not inflation of credit. What we need is confidence, more confidence, and still more confidence, and what we get is repudiation, more repudiation, and still more repudiation. There is fear and dread overhanging the land today like a dark cloud, all because confidence has been destroyed. Why has it been destroyed? Because this new-deal administration has, from the very outset repudiated its contracts, and for the first time in history—and I will challenge anyone to deny it—including the administrations of Grover Cleveland, Woodrow Wilson, and all the rest, Republican and Democratic alike, no administration since the formation of the Republic has ever dared to violate or repudiate sacred binding obligations of the Government to the people as the new-deal administration has done in depreciating the value of the dollar, repudiating the gold clause, and preventing its citizens to sue for damages. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] has expired.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. FORD].

Mr. FORD of California. Mr. Chairman, for the last hour we have been listening to very learned legal lights on the Republican side of the aisle expatiating at great length on that mouth-filling phrase "repudiation." So vehement have these gentlemen become that the ordinary person would be led to believe that the credit of the country was on the verge of going over a precipice into nothingness.

Now, what those distinguished gentlemen are contending for is a special privilege for a certain class of people in the United States. These individuals or corporations, at the instance and request of their Government, purchased up to $20,000,000,000 worth of a certain type of security. These particular securities carried an agreement calling for payment in gold of a certain weight and fineness. A situation arose in the United States where Congress found it would be impossible for the United States Government to fulfill those contracts to the letter, even if they had wanted to, for the simple reason that in all the world there was not the amount of gold that was called for in those contracts.

Plain, ordinary common sense, therefore, dictated that since it is the province of the sovereign to state what value its money shall have, to coin money, and regulate the value thereof, the content of the gold dollar was changed and the gold clause was eliminated from Government obligations. In doing this the Government was entirely within its sovereign, governmental rights. In taking this step, Mr. Chairman, who was the Government protecting? It was protecting the people of the United States against a very limited and powerful class—the holders of bonds carrying the gold clause.

One of the Members this afternoon adverted to taking the gold clause out of the bonds as financial rape and robbery. I say that if this question were allowed to be taken to the courts—and nobody knows what a court will do, it has the last guess—and the holders of these bonds be given 69 percent more than the face value of their bonds, this would be financial rape and legalized robbery of the Treasury of the United States and of the people of the United States, and to the unjust and unwarranted enrichment of a small class.

I do not believe the people of the United States have the slightest fear as to the solvency of its obligations or that the bonds they hold will not be paid. They will not be paid in gold, but they will be paid in lawful money of the United States, dollar for dollar.

Reference has been made to parity, the statement being that our moneys were not all on parity, because some of them carried different dates of maturity and different rates of interest. That has no relation at all to parity. The parity of an obligation is the fact that it will be paid at the face value printed on the obligation in the number of dollars nominated in the bond; and that is the way we expect to pay our obligations.

They talk about this bill affecting the credit of the United States. All right, suppose the holder of a gold-clause Government bond got judgment against the Government and the United States Treasury were forced to pay, not $10,000,000,000 but $16,000,000,000—there are but $10,000,000,000 of these outstanding—in order to make good the difference between the face of the bond and the amount sued for. Would that affect the credit of the Government at this critical time? We would get by with it, it is true, but the taxpayers of the country would be faced with an increase in the national debt of $6,000,000,000 or $7,000,000,000, which increase would go to a very small group of people in the community.

Now, that is the converse of what they call repudiation. It is what I call legalized robbery. But no repudiation or charge of repudiation can lie where the Federal Government stands ready to pay dollar for dollar the number of dollars nominated in the outstanding bonds. I am aware of the fact that many people say we should pay the bond not only according to the amount stipulated but according to the content stipulated. We are, however, no longer paying bonds in gold. Half the obligations that were outstanding at the time the gold content of the dollar was changed and the gold clause was removed from the bonds, have been exchanged for new bonds. Talking about injustice, you would be doing this group a grave injustice if you gave the other group which held onto their bonds the right to get an additional $6,000,000,000. Talk about the equities of the case—there they are.

But there is one other point I want to make; when the holders of these gold-clause bonds purchased them they paid the lawful money prevalent at that period. Let us take the year 1920 for an example. One thousand dollars at that time would have purchased about 750 bushels of wheat, probably less, at the price of wheat at that time. It would have purchased cotton at about 18 or 20 cents a pound. It would have purchased corn at anywhere from 80 cents to $1.20 a bushel. It would have purchased copper at 16 to 19 cents a pound. Today $1,000 in lawful money of the United States would buy, in some instances, twice the amount of any one of these commodities the 1920 dollar would have bought. How, I ask, is the man who takes this new dollar in any wise hurt financially? I cannot for the life of me see how a man could go into court with a case of this kind knowing that if he succeeded the Government of the United States would be mulcted of $6,000,000,000 or $7,000,000,000. I cannot see in all conscience how that man can justify his action as a patriotic one, for in doing this he would be endangering the credit of the United States for his own selfish interest and personal enrichment. No matter what argument you may build up on the decision of the Supreme Court in the gold-clause cases, after all, the Supreme Court did say that no damage was shown; and it is reasonable to believe that in another case the Court would say the same thing.

When you talk about injuring the credit of the United States, what could be more dangerous to the credit of the United States than to have a thousand lawsuits filed, every one of them demanding for each $1,000 bond $1,690?

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from California.

Mr. FORD of California. Let me reiterate this proposition, Mr. Chairman. It is true that two former Secretaries of the Treasury have said that the passage of this resolution would impair the credit of the United States on the theory, I presume, that it is repudiation; but I wonder whether, with all these threatened suits and the possibility of the Government being mulcted for an additional $6,000,000,000 or $7,000,000,000, the credit of the United States would not be endangered? I want to ask whether or not in your judgment as sane, patriotic citizens of the United States, you think it is a moral thing or a patriotic thing for any citizen to ask the right to go into court and for personal enrichment undermine the credit of his country?

Why do they say this will undermine the credit of the United States? One school of thought says it will bring on inflation if $10,000,000 of bonds were taken to the Treasury and the money was requested immediately. It is argued that the Government, not being able to refinance itself quick enough, would have to issue direct obligations of the Government in the form of notes and that that would result in inflation. Of course, I do not think anything of that kind would happen. Just as fast as those obligations were presented for payment, the holders would be given the option of taking new bonds or somebody else would be given the privilege of buying bonds. These bonds would be purchased rapidly enough so that payment would be made in the form of the money we have today and our financial standing would not be affected one iota.

Of course, it grieves me to hear Members of Congress accuse the Government of high crimes and misdemeanors, as has been charged on the floor of this House today.

Let me ask this question in connection with the repudiation matter: Has anybody in his research been able to find a single instance where the English Government was sued on its obligations when it devalued the pound?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORD of California. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. In England, if it is desired to sue the Crown, it is necessary to file a petition and make the request, which has to be granted.

Mr. FORD of California. Yes; the gentleman is correct.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORD of California. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HOLLISTER. The gentleman knows that the petition never fails being granted. It is always granted as a matter of course in England.

Mr. FORD of California. But I insist there is no such case on record.

Mr. SPENCE. May I ask this question? In the first case involving this subject that was filed against the United States the Court said:

> In this view of the binding quality of the Government's obligations we come to the question as to the plaintiff's right to recover damages. That is a distinct question. Because the Government is not at liberty to alter or repudiate its obligations, it does not follow that the claim advanced by the plaintiff should be sustained. The action is for breach of contract. As a remedy for breach, plaintiff can recover no more than the loss he has suffered, and of which he may rightfully complain. He is not entitled to be enriched. Plaintiff seeks judgment for $16,931.25, in present legal-tender currency, on his bond for $10,000. The question is whether he has shown damage to that extent, or any actual damage, as the Court of Claims has no authority to entertain an action for nominal damages.

I would like to know who was on the moral side of that question, the Government or the litigant?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORD of California. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I want to observe that in neither France nor England, since devaluation has taken place, has any citizen sued the Government to recover an amount greater than the actual value of the currency of the country at the time of the decision.

Mr. FORD of California. I know of no such case, nor do I know of any country whose government would countenance such a suit.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I had presumed that on broad grounds there was no fundamental difference between the majority and the minority with respect to the pending bill. But the more I listen to the discussion the more bewildered I become, and the only reason I am taking this time is not to persuade anybody to a course of action when the time comes to vote, but rather to clarify my own mental processes and be reasonably sure of my own conclusions.

We might very well take a lesson from the book of Thomas Payne, who wrote that 50-page pamphlet during colonial days called "Common Sense", and who was characterized by George Washington as the greatest single individual who precipitated the change of opinion that brought about independence for this country. It was all contained in a single sentence that Thomas Payne said:

> How can one of the American colonists profess loyalty to the King on the one hand and fight him on the other?

That phrased the issue in a nutshell.

It seems to me we have not joined the issue on this matter as yet, so far as its practical implications are concerned. I have to get things down to simple little packages. I sometimes confess my inability to understand some of these abstruse arguments. For my own immediate purpose, let me say that after we got through passing a few congressional enactments, and after a number of Presidential proclamations had been issued pursuant thereto, the net result was that we impounded and hoarded the gold of the country. We took the country off the gold standard and put it on a gold-bullion standard. In January 1934, the President by proclamation devalued the dollar. Obviously the thought was that if you took some of the gold out of the dollar and depressed its gold content to 15 and a fraction grains, prices would go up. Coupled with the speculations of the Secretary of the Treasury, the result was that gold went from $20.67 an ounce to somewhere in the neighborhood of $35 an ounce. In the very nature of human selfishness it was only normal that some citizens should ultimately come before the Supreme Court and try to collect the extra five or six hundred dollars on a thousand-dollar bond. That is simply an attribute of human selfishness.

The Supreme Court decided that the act was unconstitutional by a vote of 9 to 8; then it indicated that the plaintiff in the case could not recover because he had not lost anything. I, for one, do not quarrel with that broad proposition. I am opposed to anyone getting an extra five or six hundred dollars when he only paid on the basis of $20.67 an ounce for the bonds that he holds. So I can readily join with the Members on the majority side in refusing to stand idly by and seeing someone unjustly enriched, on the ground he had not actualy lost anything, and I will gladly join with the brethren of the majority on that broad ground.

Secondly, if within the purview of the decision of the Supreme Court they say that no damages have been shown, why obviously it would be quite puerile for this Congress to stand idly by and let thousands of litigants rush into the Federal courts and congest the machinery of our judiciary in order to collect. I can stand by that proposition, as a matter of fact. In that respect we are right in line with the message of the President that was delivered on the 27th of June. But this bill goes just a little further, and my complaint is based on 12 words in section 2 of this bill. Those words are, with respect to withdrawing consent to be sued, that such consent is withdrawn "in any proceeding of any nature whatsoever heretofore or hereafter commenced."

The Attorney General came before our committee and intimated that sooner or later the gold clause would be removed from all Federal obligations. So this means that sometime next year, perhaps, there will be no bonds, after the refunding operations are concluded, that will contain any kind of gold clause and then this controversy will not exist and will not be raised so far as any action on future bonds is concerned.

It occurs to me, then, if we pass this bill, we are taking away from the citizens of this country the right to go in and sue even when the gold issue is not involved.

Now, perhaps, Mr. Chairman, I am all wrong, but that is the way I interpret the bill, and if that is the case, I would be rather reluctant to add my vote to taking away from the citizenry of this country the right to go into the Federal courts and there have a judicial determination of their grievance with the sovereign.

There has been much said about the sovereign power having the right to withdraw the grace and privilege of being sued. I think this is absolutely true. Once upon a time kings ruled by alleged divine right under the slogan that "the king could do no wrong." If he could do no wrong, there was no use of the subject suing him, because it was alleged he could do no wrong; but if my memory of English constitutional history serves me correctly, hundreds of years ago they established the Court of Kings Bench in England for the very purpose of giving the subject the right to sue the sovereign; and if now, in this year of our Lord 1935, in a representative democracy, we are going back on that traditional constitutional development and say to our citizenry that on the basis of the obligations of the United States the privilege to go into a court and sue the sovereign is withdrawn, it looks to me like a step backward.

Obviously we can achieve what the President has in mind by adding an amendment to section 2 of this bill; and if such an amendment is added I shall be pleased to vote for this measure. It seems to me that a very proper limitation in section 2 can be inserted in the bill so as to limit the cases where the consent of the sovereign to be sued is withdrawn and to limit the cases in which a citizen is denied the right to sue to those cases that involve the gold clause and the gold principle. Does not this state the whole case? Does not this preclude people from unjust enrichment? Does not this preclude the possibility of a multiplicity of suits in the Federal courts? And, if it does, then it serves the very substance of the message of the President, and it is not necessary for this Congress to go any further. If I am right in this premise, and if it is not rebutted by anybody, I shall feel constrained to vote against this bill on that ground.

I think the minority stated the whole case in the last paragraph of their minority views when they said that this bill goes too far. Fundamentally, we have no quarrel with those who do not want to see some citizens and speculators unjustly enriched. We have no quarrel with those who want to stop multiplicity of legal actions in the courts.

I think the nub of the controversy is simply that you are going entirely too far and taking a step backward, and when we do take this step, the next autocratic step of denying the citizen the right to sue for any cause under any circumstances in Federal courts is much easier taken.

On the basis of the representations that have been made this afternoon, and on the basis of my own excursions into the substance of this bill, there is nothing else for me to do but to vote against the bill unless section 2 is amended so as to make it a little more palatable and get away from what I think is a most vicious feature and one which will constitute a step backward in this enlightened age in a representative democracy.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. COLDEN. Assuming that a citizen might bring suit and the court awards the difference that he might claim, would not that be depriving the Congress of the power to coin money and regulate the value thereof?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I doubt it very much, and I also doubt whether a dissertation upon that broad subject would be particularly germane to the substance of this bill.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, the Democratic Party in its platform of 1932 said:

> We believe that a party platform is a covenant with the people to be faithfully kept by the party when intrusted with power, and that the people are entitled to know in plain words the terms of the contract to which they are asked to subscribe.
> We hereby declare this to be the platform of the Democratic Party.
>
> * * * * * * *
> We advocate a sound currency to be preserved at all hazards.

Franklin D. Roosevelt, in his address of acceptance before the Democratic National Convention at Chicago, on July 2, 1932, said:

> That admirable document, the platform, which you have adopted is clear. I accept it 100 percent.

Throughout the Presidential campaign of 1932, Franklin D. Roosevelt in his speeches assured and reassured the citizens that a sound currency would be preserved, and that to even suggest going off the gold standard was a libel upon the credit of the United States Government.

The violation and repudiation of the pledges so made by the Democratic Party and by the President are responsible for the dishonorable legislative proposal presented here today. It arises out of a series of piratical executive and legislative acts which were wicked in conception, unjust in purpose, tyrannical in execution, and cruel in their results.

This administration has attempted by legislation and by Executive orders to repudiate contractual obligations entered into by the Government with its citizens. The purpose of the obligations was to enable the Government to meet a great national extremity by means of loans obtained from patriotic citizens.

The issue between the Government and one defrauded citizen has been presented to and decided by the Supreme Court of the United States. The Court has held that—

> The Constitution gives to the Congress the power to borrow money on the credit of the United States.

That—

> Having this power to authorize the issue of definite obligations for the payment of money borrowed, the Congress has not been vested with authority to alter or destroy those obligations.

The President now ignores the legal and moral aspects of the issue involved in the decision and instead seizes with avidity upon a scheme of sharp practice by which with the aid of Congress he hopes to achieve repudiation in fact, a result he failed to accomplish by legislation.

The Supreme Court, in the opinion in the gold-clause case, said:

> The fact that the United States may not be sued without its consent is a matter of procedure which does not affect the legal and binding character of its contracts.

Continuing, the Court, in its opinion, pointed out:

> While the Congress is under no duty to provide remedies through the courts, the contractual obligations still exist and, despite the infirmities of procedure, remain binding upon the conscience of the sovereign.

The President in his message to the Congress under date of June 27, 1935, urges the Congress to take legislative action the avowed purpose of which is to deprive American citizens the right of access to the courts to recover any damage they may have suffered or may suffer in the future from the illegal acts of the Congress.

> "Before the termination of this session of the Congress", said President Roosevelt, "I believe that it is important that definite action be taken to eliminate any uncertainty with respect to the right of holders of gold-clause bonds of the Government to sue for repayment either in gold or else in legal tender with an additional sum of 69 cents on every dollar."

The joint resolution to consummate this fraud upon American citizens, as requested by the President in his message, is now before the Congress. The proposal is dishonorable, and ordinarily such a request would reflect upon the integrity of this legislative body. The President, however, having previously tested the moral fiber of the Congress and having found it weak, he is now emboldened to ask that the Congress venture beyond the domain of national honor, and trifle with our national safety.

The Congress is asked to impair the basis of our national credit, "a power" which the Supreme Court points out is "vital to the Government—upon which, in an extremity, its very life may depend."

Is the Congress prepared to vote to destroy or even impair a power upon which the very life of the Nation may depend?

Let me quote from the opinion of the Supreme Court on this point:

> The Constitution—
> Says Chief Justice Hughes—
> gives to the Congress the power to borrow money on the credit of the United States, an unqualified power, a power vital to the Government—upon which in an extremity its very life may depend.

Mr. Chairman, no nation can meet a grave national extremity without the use of national credit. National credit is based upon the confidence which the citizens have in the honor and integrity of their government. Confidence in the integrity of government is neither the child of repudiation nor of confiscation. It has been said:

> That which raises a country, that which strengthens a country, and that which dignifies a country—that which spreads her power, creates her moral influence, and makes her respected * * * is character.

It ought to be the aspiration of every Member of the Congress to contribute to the honor, the dignity, and the prestige of his Government—not to cast his vote for legislation that will destroy these cherished attributes of sovereignty. [Applause.]

The Chief Executive ought never to have asked the Congress to commit the first illegal act, upon which the present dishonorable demand is predicated. It can be justified upon neither moral nor legal grounds.

A demand from the President addressed to the Congress to destroy a power vital to the very life of the Nation is not consonant with his oath of office.

The borrowing power of the Government is under a terrific strain. Repudiation has already shattered the confidence of the investing public in the ultimate redemption of Government obligations. The Government, unable to sell to the public, has forced the banks to absorb the ever-increasing issues of its obligations made necessary by constantly mounting expenditures. This program, if continued, must of necessity lead to a national extremity. The wild and reckless squandering of public funds for the promotion of communistic and socialistic experiments has proceeded so far that already national disintegration has set in. What are the symptoms of national disintegration? They have been summarized by a keen student and diagnostician of socialism and communism. I quote:

> Dislike of any kind of constraint; continued lowering of the prestige of law and government; general hatred of superiority, whether of fortune or intelligence; absence of solidarity between the various social strata and class struggles; utter contempt for the old ideals of liberty and fraternity; progress of the extremist doctrines preaching the destruction of the established social order, no matter what that order may be; and substitution of autocratic collective powers for old forms of government. Such symptoms, especially the distaste for constraint and the undisciplined contempt for law, necessarily lead to the development of a revolutionary spirit, with its inseparable companions, violence and hatred.

The program of state socialism which, with slight variations, has been launched by this administration here, has been carried to consummation in Russia, Germany, Austria, and Italy, and the final result in each of the unfortunate countries has been a loss of individual liberty and rule by a dictator.

Mr. Chairman, there are other passages in the President's message which should not go unchallenged.

> • • • the interests of our entire people—

Said President Roosevelt—

> require that the Government of the United States make it clear that it cannot and will not consent to the use of its courts in aid of efforts to sabotage the operations of Government or in aid of private speculation.

Who does the President accuse of an attempt to "sabotage" the operations of Government? Who are they? Of what act have they been guilty that they should be deprived of access to the courts of the United States to seek redress for wrongs suffered by them at the hands of a tyrannical Executive and a rubber-stamp Congress? I shall tell you who some of them are.

When the World War was in progress the United States Government had to have money. It had to have money with which to buy airplanes, cannon, rifles, machine guns, horses, food, ships, and clothing for the soldiers. Not only millions but billions of dollars had to be spent to equip our soldiers for war. Where did the Government get this money? It borrowed it from the people. Great sales forces were organized by the Government to sell bonds to patriotic citizens. Even children were persuaded to buy savings stamps, until from their small earnings they could accumulate enough to buy a United States bond. The great Government sales organization swept across the country into every State, county, city, village, and hamlet appealing to every man, woman, and child in the name of patriotism to buy bonds to help win the war. The soldiers fighting at the front and the soldiers behind the lines were urged to buy Government bonds. They did buy bonds. They bought them until "it hurt." The people were told that the bonds would be redeemed in gold. It was a Democratic administration that issued these obligations, and across the face of each one was printed a promise to pay the bond in gold.

The President urged the Congress to repudiate the promise made by the Government to its citizens. The Congress attempted to repudiate the obligations of the Government even though the fourteenth amendment, in its fourth section, declares that:

> The validity of the public debt of the United States, authorized by law • • • shall not be questioned.

Now the Congress is told by the President that the people who bought these bonds are guilty of "sabotage"; that they seek "to harass and embarrass sovereign action by the Government."

Once it was said of a foreign usurper who, I assume, had a psychopathic mania for power:

> He was witty and sanguine. His supreme assurance inspired for a time universal confidence. He fascinated and seduced the Court, he smiled away their fears, and with promises dispelled all doubts.

Mr. Chairman, the period of fascination and seduction in this country has passed. The fears of the people cannot be smiled away, and promises have ceased to dispel their doubts. The citizens of this Nation expect the Congress to display honesty, intelligence, independence, and judgment in the conduct of its legislative functions. This national crisis can be met in no other way.

Mr. Chairman, this is not the first crisis this Nation has had to face and to surmount. There have been several crises. Let me single out one of them.

When Hon. William McKinley was elected President of the United States, what was the condition of the Nation? The country was impoverished, the Treasury overdrawn, and there was a rapidly mounting public debt. There was bitterness, class hatred, hunger, and unemployment. William McKinley was inaugurated March 4, 1897. What was his program? Did he demand dictatorial Executive powers? Did he attempt to destroy industry? Did he advise repudiation of Government bonds? Did he demand personal access to the public purse and the right to squander the public funds? Did he ask for the adoption of un-American laws demanded by alien enemies within our gates? William McKinley demanded none of these powers. His program is revealed in his inaugural address. I quote:

> The credit of the Government, the integrity of the currency, and inviolability of its obligations must be preserved.

In that same address he said:

> Economy is demanded in every branch of the Government at all times, but especially in periods like the present, of depression in business and distress among the people. The severest economy must be observed in all public expenditures, and extravagance stopped wherever in the future it may be developed.

He further said:

> Our naturalization and immigration laws should be further improved, to the constant promotion of a safer, a better, and a higher citizenship. A grave peril to the Republic would be a citizenship too ignorant to understand or too vicious to appreciate the great value and beneficence of our institutions and laws, and against all who come here to make war upon them, our gates must be promptly and tightly closed.

And what were his closing words—not a request for dictatorial power, but instead this was his appeal to his fellow countrymen:

> Let me again repeat the words of the oath administered by the Chief Justice, which in their respective spheres, so far as applicable, I would have all of my countrymen observe:
> "I will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States, and will to the best of my ability preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States."
> This is the obligation I have reverently taken before the Lord Most High. To keep it will be my single purpose, my constant prayer; and I shall confidently rely upon the forbearance and assistance of all the people in the discharge of my solemn responsibilities.

That was the program; that was the appeal of William McKinley.

What was the condition of the country when he left it?

Prosperous, furnaces blazing, mills running, exports multiplying, labor abundant, wages unprecedented, good will prevailed, and our national credit sound.

This Nation, under the righteous leadership of William McKinley, emerged from the crisis with a sound currency, with its national honor unstained, and with the Constitution unimpaired.

The legislation which the Congress has before it today, if enacted into law, will impair our national credit and place a stain on our national honor.

The dishonorable course which the Congress is asked to pursue, if complied with, will not bring prosperity to the people of this Nation. Instead, compliance with bring only shame and dishonor.

Let us not forget that—

A state to prosper must be built on foundations of a moral character, and this character is the principal element of its strength and the only guaranty of its permanence and prosperity.

[Applause.]

During the delivery of Mr. REED's remarks the following occurred:

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's words be taken down. He says that the moral fiber of Congress has gone. I challenge that statement.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that no quorum is present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and thirty-two Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the demand of the gentleman from Texas comes too late. The gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] had read several paragraphs after the words complained of.

Mr. McFARLANE. The gentleman from New York was reading his speech, which he had no right to do without permission of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the words complained of.

The Clerk read as follows:

The President, however, having previously tested the moral fiber of the Congress, and having found it weak, he is now emboldened to ask that the Congress venture beyond the domain of national honor and trifle with our national safety.

The CHAIRMAN. On the point of order made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] that the demand of the gentleman from Texas comes too late, the point of order is sustained. The gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] will proceed.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, I raise the further point of order. The gentleman is reading his speech, and I want the House to pass on whether we have got to listen to such remarks.

Mr. SNELL. I make the point of order that that question was raised several days ago, and the House made the decision itself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas objects to the gentleman from New York reading his speech. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] makes the point that the House passed on this very question. The Chair is of the opinion that the House, on the occasion referred to, passed on a specific case and not generally. The question is, Will the Committee permit the gentleman from New York to continue reading his speech?

The question was taken; and the Committee decided to allow the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] to proceed.

Thereupon Mr. REED completed his speech, and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.

Mr. LUCKEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. LUCKEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise to ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be granted another minute so that I may ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time is under the control of the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. CHRISTIANSON] such time as he may desire.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. REILLY] has just told us that the conditions of today are as different from those which existed in 1893 as conditions in 1893 were different from those which prevailed when George Washington was President. I agree with the gentleman that there have been great social, technological, and economic changes, but I want to call to his attention the fact that there are some things that have not changed, will not change, and cannot change, among which are the rules of honor between man and man [applause] and the inviolability of obligations. [Applause.]

We may violate these rules from time to time, we may shirk our obligations for a while, but always we return to them, for it is the experience of mankind that an orderly human society cannot exist except upon the basis of mutual respect and confidence. In 1858 the people of Minnesota authorized a $5,000,000 loan of credit to aid in the building of railroads. Two years later at a referendum they repudiated the obligation and directed the legislature to levy no tax for the payment of either principal or interest. For a quarter of a century the default lay as a stain on the escutcheon of the State, but in 1882, spurred on by John S. Pillsbury, an honest and fearless chief executive, who would rather be right than Governor, the voters of Minnesota, by a vote of 31,011 to 13,589, erased the stigma from the State's shield, and today the memory of Governor Pillsbury is revered by all the people. So I predict that whatever we do today eventually there will come a time when the Congress of the United States will recognize that a nation's honor is the most precious of its possessions.

The debate has disclosed that there is a misconception concerning what this bill provides and what the consequences will be if we do not pass it. It has been charged that a vote against this measure is a vote to permit the holders of $10,000,000,000 in Government bonds to enrich themselves unjustly to the extent of $7,000,000,000, and to place upon the taxpayers of the country a burden of $7,000,000,000 in additional debt. Those who have made this charge assume that because the gold value of the dollar has been reduced from 100 cents to 59, the holders of gold bonds would be able to recover as many 59-cent dollars as would equal in gold value the 100-cent dollars with which they parted when they purchased the obligations. As an eminent Democrat is wont to say, "Let's look at the record." There was nothing in the recent Supreme Court decision to justify the assumption. What the Court said was, in effect, that a failure to pay in gold constituted a breach of contract, and that a holder bringing suit against the Government would be required to prove his damages. He could not compel specific performance, but must be satisfied with reimbursement for the loss he had actually sustained.

It should be apparent that unless the dollar were further devalued, he would be unable to show any damage, for the purchasing power of the present dollar is greater than that of the dollar with which he parted when the bonds were issued. The very fact that this legislation is sought indicates strongly that the administration contemplates a further devaluation, or that it has plans for future expenditures that will still more unbalance the Budget and bring on an inflation of the currency. If the dollar should depreciate to the extent the German mark did during the post-war period, the holders of Government bonds would, of course, have little difficulty in establishing a loss which they cannot now prove. It would appear, therefore, that no more effective way could be found to halt the administration in its reckless financial operations than to refuse to pass this bill.

I reiterate that proof of actual damage sustained by reason of the purely theoretical devaluation of the dollar that has thus far been accomplished would be difficult and, indeed, practically impossible. It would not be sufficient to show that there has been a rise in the price level, for there is no unanimity of opinion among economists that the devaluation of the dollar has affected any prices. Even if it were assumed that devaluation has influenced the price level, it would be exceedingly difficult for any individual claimant to prove the extent to which devaluation has been a factor. Presumably a devastating and wide-spread drought has had a much greater effect than the reduction in the number of grains in a gold dollar buried in the vaults of the Treasury, which nobody sees, which nobody is permitted to possess, and which nobody uses in any business transaction.

I shall not attempt to prove either that devaluation reduced the value of the dollar or that it did not. If it did not, the gold-bond holder suffered no loss. If it did, and the holder could prove it—which he could not—it is reasonable to assume that the taxpayer's income, reflecting the same changes in the price level as those which furnished the basis for the bondholder's claim, would have increased to the same extent as the value of the bondholder's paper had been reduced. In that event the bondholder's recovery would leave both him and the taxpayer in the same relative situation in which they were before the devaluation took place.

I do not care which horn of the dilemma the administration chooses to accept, for in either event it is answered by its own argument.

Furthermore, it should be remembered that if it happened that a court gave to any claimant a judgment that would result in his unjust enrichment, Congress would not be without power to correct the error. A mere judgment would not give to any bondholder a single dollar of reimbursement; Congress would have to appropriate the money to pay the judgment and its failure to do so would make the judgment, in practical effect, a nullity.

I have no patience with the attempt that has been made this afternoon to justify the present measure on the ground that there is no inherent right to sue the State and that therefore the action we are taking does not constitute repudiation. That that argument should be advanced is additional proof that the present administration is reactionary and not in any sense liberal. I had not expected the spokesman of the present regime to acknowledge that it bases its policies on the philosophy of the Middle Ages.

The principle that the sovereign cannot be sued without his consent goes back to the time of the divine right of kings. It is based upon the assumption that the king can do no wrong. The American Revolution was a definite repudiation of that philosophy. With us the rule that the state cannot be sued without its consent is merely a vestigial remnant—a vermiform appendix which bears evidence of our lowly origin. As the implications of a newer and more realistic conception of the relation between the Government and the citizen have become more and more clearly understood, we have removed one by one the restrictions and inhibitions which formerly deprived the people of the opportunity to have their grievances heard and considered.

I hold no brief for any bondholder or for the gold clause. By my vote I helped to banish the gold clause, and I regret that the present administration saw fit to issue gold bonds at a time when it must have anticipated its decision to repudiate them.

But, despite my aversion to the gold clause, I cannot by my vote sanction a measure which denies to any citizen his day in court, which refuses restitution for any actual damage that can be proved, and which definitely alines the United States with the defaulting nations of the world.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time, 3 minutes, to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FIESINGER].

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Chairman, several times upon this floor today I heard the statement made that England devalued the pound. England did not devalue the pound, in the sense that we devalued the dollar, by cutting down the gold content. She merely went off gold and let the pound fall where it would.

There have been harsh words used here today. The word "repudiation" has been used. I do not believe the situation warrants the use of the word "repudiation." When the agitation was going on for devaluing the dollar, I do not believe that the President of the United States was personally in favor of that course.

There was a tremendous agitation in this country, and it was participated in not alone by Democrats but it was participated in by the Republicans. Many men in Congress on the Republican side voted for that proposition. Many of the industrialists who were Republicans expressed themselves favorably upon that proposition. I think it came about through force of circumstance. Personally I never was in favor of the proposal, and said at the time instead of devaluing the dollar we should take the inflated and high purchasing power out of what the dollar is made of—gold. I offered a proposal to take the high purchasing power out of gold, and that would not only have relieved the producing classes in America but everywhere in the world. As I have said so many times before on the floor of the House, I am in favor of having a dollar with purchasing power and debt-paying power as of the time these obligations were incurred; and this would be somewhere along about 1926. No man on this floor is more against the unjust enrichment of these bondholders than I am. These bonds and the interest thereon will have to be paid out of the labor of the producers of America, and, Lord knows, I would not add to their burdens any more than is just and fair.

I think we misunderstand the fundamentals underlying money. In the few minutes I have I shall not be able to go into this question, but I want to quote a couple of paragraphs from the Georgetown Law Journal of March 1935, from an article written by Mr. Phanor J. Eder on the Gold Clause cases in the light of history. Mr. Eder says:

> Does money belong to the citizen or does it belong to the State?
> An answer to this question is fundamental. If money belongs to the State and is allocated to the citizen only as a convenient instrument to facilitate the interchange of goods and services, as a medium of exchange, as a "ticket" for goods", then obviously the State can do what it pleaseth with money in order to facilitate exchanges, distribute goods, improve trade, and promote prosperity. If it belongs to the individual possessor in fee, so to say, if it is more than a mere medium of exchange, if it constitutes a "store of value", a proper instrument for effecting savings and investment, then the State under older views of law cannot deliberately impair its value or take it from him, in whole or in part, for the good of the community any more than it can take his home for a public use without just compensation. To hold otherwise, as the Supreme Court now does, is to subordinate private rights and private law to newer concepts, revived from medieval times, of the supremacy of public rights and public law. This is in line with tendencies clearly manifested abroad in recent years, but which the common law has heretofore restricted.
> The common law has consistently regarded money as the property of the individual, not of the State. Our law of money springs from two sources, the precedents of the King's courts and the law merchant. The debt of the law merchant to the Roman and continental law is well recognized. Our researches have convinced us that, as to money, the debt of the old English law is no less striking. It is therefore necessary to examine these foreign sources. In addition, European doctrines and practices have had, and still have, a continuous, if indirect, influence on our monetary evolution.

I believe we shall eventually see the wisdom of common-law doctrine, that money belongs to the people rather than to the sovereign. That principle was worked out as a result of long struggle between the sovereign and the people, and finally became a fixed and crystallized principle of the common law, which was never violated until after the World War.

When we devalued the dollar we violated that principle, and it was not done, as I said, by Democrats alone but by Republicans as well, and it is my honest judgment that President Roosevelt, if he were acting alone and had not had the pressure of Congress and certain elements of the country, would not have done so. Today we are asked to vote for a proposal to further violate that principle of the common law by taking away the right of a citizen to be heard in the courts for the violation of his rights evolved through the experiences of mankind and expressed in the light of the common law. This is wrong no. 2, and two wrongs never make a right:

Devaluation of the dollar, in my judgment, has not done the country any good. It has only added to monetary confusion. I am satisfied that the President and the Congress did the right thing in going off gold redemption. In view of the peculiar psychology of the American people, it was wise to retreat from gold redemption, and that had salutary effect. Wheat and cotton, as a result of that action, sold for about or above the price before devaluation, and after we went off gold redemption, than those products are selling for today with devaluation.

Mr. Chairman, what we should have done was to regulate the value or purchasing power of gold, for our troubles have come as a result of low world gold price levels, which govern when we sell our products abroad, and I refer particularly to prime commodities of which we produce an exportable surplus. Devaluing the dollar did not help world gold price levels, and hence the troubles of wheat, cotton, copper, and all other prime commodities we sell abroad. Let us take the case of cotton.

I have watched with great interest the troubles of cotton, and what is true of cotton is likewise true of other commodities of which we produce and sell an exportable surplus. The average crop of cotton is around 10,000,000 bales, of which we export about 50 percent. Gold is the measure of value of cotton exported. We are prone to think in terms of the farmer selling cotton, but the object of his transaction is to acquire gold, so would it not be more accurate to think that what he is really doing is buying gold? So if the cotton farmer is in effect buying gold, is there not some way we could regulate the purchasing power of gold? Domestically we have attempted to regulate the purchasing power of the dollar, but we have never attempted to regulate the purchasing power of gold, so the cotton farmer is at the mercy of the unregulated purchasing power of gold or the thing he is buying with his cotton.

But that is not the worst of it. He is at the mercy of his own Government, for as a gold buyer he is in direct competition with his own Government, skimming the world of its gold and then sterilizing it. What he gets, of course, for his gold is paper dollars which give him a 40-percent differential, but his Government keeps the world gold price of cotton in a vice by its competition with him for gold, and that keeps his dollar price down.

Even with the 40-percent differential it fails to give him a profit, and this in turn produces all manner of economic ills that we are seeking to cure by a national policy of subsidies and benefits. Gold competition also affects cotton producers everywhere in the world and starves their purchasing power, which in turn causes stagnation of trade that we might have if this were not so. Said competition causes a condition which might be illustrated as follows:

Suppose a thousand people were lost in a desert, their water supply having been exhausted, and they were parched with thirst, and it were announced to all that an oasis was near, but it contained only half enough water to satisfy the requirements of all; can you imagine the ensuing struggle and complaint and dissatisfaction after the water had all been consumed?

The image here may be extended to the gold situation. Through hoarding and sterilization, the world gold oasis contains a little more than half enough to satisfy and the struggle thereby engendered expresses itself in the world commodity price level, of which our cotton farmer, our wheat farmer, and all others producing prime commodities for export are the victims.

If one accepts this view the depression is a world problem and has a common cause, as the same phenomena exists everywhere. Its cause is depressed world gold-price levels. It has been treated thus far as a local problem, its mainfestations on unemployment and stagnation of world trade. This bears heavily upon the producers of price commodities, and in turn upon manufactured commodities. The latter is secondary, the first is primary because it is from this source, and only this source, that gives stimulus to manufactured commodities.

Without contradiction competent economists have claimed an appreciation of the value of gold in terms of commodities of as much as 65 percent, and possibly 75 percent, since the year 1926. The orthodox economists claim the value of gold cannot be regulated. That may be so, but if it could be regulated, the purchasing power of cotton could be increased, if the purchasing power of gold were decreased. It is not difficult to visualize what would happen if the purchasing power of cotton was increased by 25 percent or 30 percent of, say, 50 percent. It would greatly stimulate consumption of manufactured goods, increase employment, land values would increase and encourage investment in durable goods, cotton States would take on new life and prosperity.

What would be done for the South would likewise be done for the Central West and West and, for that matter, the industrial East in stimulating manufacture and decreasing unemployment.

As I say, the professional economists claim you cannot operate upon the purchasing power of gold. If they are wrong, it would not be the first time almost universal professional opinion was wrong. I am reminded in this connection by what I recently heard. A certain Congressman had cataracts; all the doctors consulted advised he would have to wait until the cataracts ripened, maybe a period of 10 years; in the meantime he would become progressively blind. An eye specialist of renown assured him he could ripen the cataracts in 2 weeks and restore his failing sight by an operation almost immediately. And again all the doctors in the world had been telling their patients that angina pectoris was incurable. The other day a surgeon in Cleveland refuted all this by an operation; so it is possible the orthodox economists may be wrong. Let us see. In operating on the purchasing power of gold, of course, you have to operate upon the supply and demand ratio of gold. Bring the supply and demand of gold in equilibrium. To satisfy the demand for gold, use a gold equivalent.

Silver has a world-recognized market value and for centuries has been used as a monetary metal. Give silver legal tender qualities for its world-accepted gold value. It is thus a gold equivalent. Make silver a means of payment at its equivalent gold value. The more silver is used for this purpose, the less the requirement for gold to be used for the same purpose. Thus the demand for gold is relieved, and its power over commodities is lessened, lessened to that degree required, say to average of 1921–29 price level, and when this is reached, stabilize gold at that point, or any desired point. When gold is stabilized, it becomes an unvarying standard of measurement and that standard of measurement must be so gaged so as to do justice between debtor and creditor, producer and consumer.

There is no question but what the nub of the bonus vote, the Goldsborough amendment, was to raise price levels by artificial means. The struggle is not new, it has been going on more than 3 years, and each time the House has voted, the issue to raise price levels has shown tremendous strength, showing the temper of the country on this subject. If the issue is not met and controlled with sound money, and in the above only sound money is provided, the dams that are holding back this sentiment will break open and we shall have a period of fiat money, if not a total collapse of our monetary system. The trick, however, is to raise price levels everywhere in the world and not locally only. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include therein these excerpts.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, this resolution simply withdraws the consent of the United States to be sued upon any of its obligations for the repayment of money or upon any coin or currency of the United States or upon any claim arising out of the surrender or acquisition of such coin or currency. The need for this legislation grew out of the decisions recently rendered by the Supreme Court in what are known as the "gold clause" cases. Those decisions decided the constitutionality of various legislation passed by the Seventy-third Congress relative to obligations containing a provision for payment in gold and relative to the value and control of our currency and coin. This legislation, in connection with the Executive orders issued in pursuance thereof, was designed to establish a definite internal economy or domestic policy relating to the currency and provided:

First. That any obligation which purported to give the obligee a right to require payment in gold shall be discharged upon the payment, dollar for dollar, in any coin or currency which is legal tender.

Second. That all holders of gold or gold certificates shall be required to deliver such holdings to the United States Treasury.

Third. That no one could lawfully possess gold and that it could no longer remain in circulation.

Fourth. That certain restrictions shall be placed upon the use of gold in foreign exchange.

Fifth. That the exportation of gold shall be prohibited.

Sixth. That all forms of money shall be placed upon a parity dollar for dollar and all shall be legal tender.

Seventh. That the gold content of the dollar shall be decreased.

These series of measures and orders regarding the currency had fixed a positive domestic policy and it was to test this legislation that a number of suits reached the United States Supreme Court. These may be divided into three classes. Two were to test the validity of the act of Congress providing that an obligation calling for payment in gold shall be discharged upon payment, dollar for dollar, in any legal tender money: (a) As applied to obligations of the Government itself; (b) as to all other obligations.

The other was a suit on gold certificates claiming the face value in gold or its equivalent. The Supreme Court held all these acts and orders within the powers of Congress under the Constitution except that part of the resolution which provided that the obligations of the Government containing the gold clause shall be discharged upon payment in any legal tender. The Court held that this resolution went beyond the constitutional power so far as it applied to obligations of the United States, but the same opinion held that the holder of an obligation containing the gold clause was not damaged because of the resolution and acts of Congress denying his right to demand payment in gold.

In the course of these opinions the Court said that the plaintiff could recover the loss he had suffered, but "he is not entitled to be enriched."

The question of actual loss cannot be fairly determined without considering the economic situation at the time the Government offered to pay him (plaintiff) the $10,000, the face of his bond, in legal-tender currency. The case is not the same as if gold coin had remained in circulation.

Plaintiff's damages could not be assessed without regard to the internal economy of the country at the time the alleged breach occurred. The discontinuance of gold payments and the establishment of legal-tender currency on a standard unit of value with which "all forms of money" of the United States were to be "maintained at parity" had a controlling influence upon the domestic economy. It was adjusted to the new basis. A free domestic market for gold was nonexistent.

And in view of the control of export and foreign exchange and the restricted domestic use, the question of value, in relation to transactions legally available to the plaintiff, would require a consideration of the purchasing power of the dollars which the plaintiff has received. Plaintiff has not shown, or attempted to show, that in relation to buying power he has sustained any loss whatever. On the contrary, in view of the adjustment of the "internal economy" to the single measure of value as established by the legislation of the Congress and the universal availability and use throughout the country of the legal-tender currency in meeting all engagements, the payment to the plaintiff of the amount which he demands would appear to constitute not a recoupment of loss in any proper sense but an unjustified enrichment.

The devaluation of the gold dollar placed the "domestic economy" upon a new basis. In the currency as thus provided, States and municipalities must receive their taxes, railroads their rates and fares, and public utilities their charges for services. The income out of which they must meet their obligation is determined by the new standard.

Their receipts should not be determined by one standard and the payment of their obligations by another.

What do these terms, "internal economy", "economic situation", and "domestic economy", as used in this opinion, mean? Do they mean if the price of commodities rise and the cost of living increases that the holder of a gold certificate or a gold-clause bond has been damaged, and for that reason he should be paid $1.69 on the dollar? I suppose no thinking man would contend that. The terms refer to the systematic management or adjustment of our monetary system. Not that prices may rise or fall, but that the Government had adopted a constitutional domestic or internal monetary policy, and the question is whether the holders of gold obligations were damaged by reason of that economic policy.

In the case of an obligation of the Government to pay money to the individual, he cannot be damaged by reason of the recent monetary legislation and policy of this administration. This is true because he cannot possess gold or place it in circulation; because he cannot export it or use it in international exchange; and because all money is on a parity, dollar for dollar. Under this domestic or internal economy as the Court calls it, there can be no damage to the individual in failing to receive gold. That is why the Court said, "in view of the adjustment of the internal economy to the single measure of value", and the placing of all money upon a parity and making it all available as legal tender, the holder of a gold-clause bond could not be damaged if he did not receive the gold or its equivalent in value. If there can be no damage, then why permit suits to annoy and bedevil the Government.

Under this resolution no one who holds an obligation of the Government of any kind for the repayment of money shall be permitted to sue the United States on its promise to pay. This resolution does not bar suits on any other cause of action that may arise. It does not deprive its citizens of the right to sue in any other case. It is a universal principle that the sovereign power cannot be sued without its consent. No action can be brought against it unless permission has been granted by law. It may be conceded if the Government, in its administrative capacity, inflicts a wrong upon an individual resulting in his damage that he should be given the right of redress in court. But no government should be sued by reason of the exercise of its sovereign power. No government on earth, except the United States, permits its nationals to sue it on account of its promise to pay money. The establishment and maintenance of a monetary policy is a sovereign power, and no government should be sued on account of it.

To say that an individual should be permitted to sue the Government, because in the exercise of its sovereign right it passes legislation or adopts a policy that may result in some inconvenience or pecuniary loss to him, is the very apex of absurdity and the height of folly. Congress may declare war, resulting in serious damage to individuals. It may pass a tariff law causing an increase in the cost of commodities. It may pass bankruptcy laws permitting debtors to wipe out their obligations to creditors. It may pass income-tax legislation which some people may think is a burden upon them. But to contend that because of this legislation and, perhaps, of hardships upon and loss to some individuals that they should have a right to sue the Government is to enter the realm of the ridiculous. It is equally fallacious to permit the individual to sue the Government because a certain monetary system or internal policy has been established by Congress under the Constitution which he does not like, even if it should result in damage to him, which it does not and cannot do. [Applause.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York referred to the present issue of Government securities as "scraps of paper", involving loss of confidence in the Government. The answer to this is that the Treasury has recently floated securities at an interest rate as low as one-tenth of 1 percent, the lowest interest ever paid in the history of this Government. [Applause.] The gold-clause bonds are now selling at a premium since the act of 1933; and the highest interest rate recently paid on long-time securities by the Treasury is only 2⅞ percent, whereas the old bonds that are now under discussion bear a rate of 4¼ percent.

Government credit has reached high tide under the present administration [applause], and this has happened since the enactment of the act of June 5, 1933; and the condition has been sustained since the country at large, and the bondholders in particular, have learned that the proposal now under consideration is going to become a law. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Ohio talked at length about the decision of the Supreme Court involving the constitutionality of laws passed by this Congress, but he declined to yield for a question, and I imagine it was because he knew I was going to ask him if he contends for a minute that the measure now before the House is unconstitutional or that its constitutionality is doubted by anybody. The sovereign has always been recognized as exempt from suit at the hands of its subjects; only by permission may it be sued; and there is nothing in this resolution that will deny a future Congress the power to give the opportunity to any citizen of the country to adjudicate any damage sustained and have it repaired by the Government. But just as the gentleman from Minnesota declared, no damage can be proven by any of the holders of these bonds.

That being the case, I ask why in the name of common sense should the Government submit itself to harassment, annoyance, and expense at the hands of litigants who have no claims that could stand up in any court? The plain fact is that this sovereign right of the Government to exemption from suit cannot be contracted away. It is not within the power of the Congress to destroy that right of the Government. The very fact that we are here now, offering to repeal a former enactment permitting suits, is answer to any argument that such enactment can be binding upon a subsequent Congress. If we gave the permission and the damages could be shown, the sovereign right would still repose in the people of this country to decline to pay the damages adjudicated unless through their representatives the people of the Nation decided to recognize the obligation. The truth is every effort by this favored class to exact payment by the Government at the expense of less favored classes or to enforce the collection of a debt in gold in contravention of the sovereign right of the Government to regulate the value of money is unjust, unfair, vicious as against sound public policy, and inherently immoral. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The resolution under consideration contains a preamble, which the Clerk will read. The Committee, however, will consider the body of the resolution first and then return to the preamble.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the lawful holders of the coins or currencies of the United States shall be entitled to exchange them, dollar for dollar, for other coins or currencies which may be lawfully acquired and are legal tender for public and private debts; and that the owners of the gold-clause securities of the United States shall be, at their election, entitled to receive immediate payment of the stated dollar amount thereof with interest to the date of payment or to prior maturity or to prior redemption date, whichever is earlier. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to make such exchanges and payments upon presentation hereunder in the manner provided in regulations prescribed by him. The period within which the owners of gold-clause securities shall be entitled hereunder to receive payment prior to maturity shall expire September 1, 1935, or on such later date, not after January 1, 1936, as may be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I think one of the most interesting points of discussion in respect to this bill was brought out by the gentleman from Alabama when he attempted to justify this bill in the light of the national credit. I am not going to take too much of my 5 minutes to answer that, except to say that there is one very good reason why the credit of the United States is good today. That is because these banks whose sides are literally bulging with money, with no place to put it otherwise, are investing in short-term Government securities. Within the next fiscal year it is going to be necessary for the Government to issue and market something like $9,000,000,000 of its obligations, which includes a refunding operation of about $5,000,000,000 and new obligations to the extent of about $4,000,000,000. That will be the test as to whether this act is peculiarly conducive to confidence.

Mr. Chairman, I challenge anyone on this floor to deny the fact that we are entering an era whereby it will become necessary for the Federal Government to use every particle of power which will be given it under the Banking Act of 1935 and under this act to maintain the credit of the United States. Banks are buying these short-term Government bonds so they can unload them quickly and get into the industrial market when there is a market for industrial securities. The only reason why they are investing in Government securities today is because they have no demand for their money by legitimate business. That is why our Government credit is good.

Why is it necessary to write into the Banking Act of 1935 the policy whereby the President of the United States, acting through his Federal Reserve Board, may compel the banks to take a large number of Federal securities? Why is it necessary to set up in this bill a stipulation that under no circumstances involving any question whatsoever shall these banks or individuals whose money is invested in Government obligations have the right to test the validity of such obligations? Take the Banking Act of 1935 and this bill together, the Secretary of the Treasury, acting through the Federal Reserve Board, the open-market committee, or whatever form it takes when it comes back from the Senate, may compel the banks of this Nation to subscribe to these $9,000,000,000 of obligations without an aye, yes, or no as to the validity of them. Is that conducive to confidence?

Mr. Chairman, the test is going to come when an industry goes to its bank and says, "We want to borrow some money" and the banks says to the industry, "We cannot lend you any money because the Federal Reserve Board, at the dictation of the President of the United States, the dictator of all finance and economics in the United States, has decreed that we buy Government obligations instead of lending the money to industry in order to put men back to work."

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FORD of California. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words. Mr. Chairman, I am going to make a very brief statement. I want the House to consider this one fact. Time and again the Republican opposition, on the other side of the aisle, have wailed to high heaven and asked us to stop expending money. When the $5,000,000,000 work-relief bill was up they fought it tooth and nail. But, of course, it was for the relief of all the people.

Now, when we come in with a measure which will prevent a selfish group of owners of bonds who never did a day's work, who want to get from the Government six or seven billion dollars for nothing, the Republicans savagely fight it. Why? Because they represent that bondholding gang, and they are going to stand by them all the time. [Applause.]

Mr. CAVICCHIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORD of California. No; I refuse to yield. Here is where the line is drawn in this House. Whenever you want to appropriate a dollar to help all the people of the United States, the Republicans are against you. Whenever you want to do anything that will keep the little crowd of bondholders they represent from looting the Treasury and robbing the people, they stand for that crowd. [Applause.]

That has been their philosophy ever since I came to this House, and as I have studied Congress for years I know that that has been their philosophy ever since the Republican Party came into power. [Applause.]

Their philosophy might be summed up by paraphrasing a famous slogan, "Millions for the special interests, not one cent for the common people."

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last four words. Mr. Chairman, I am not a member of this great Banking and Currency Committee, but I have been a Member of the House for three terms, and I was here when the vote was taken on the devaluation of the dollar. I listened to the distiguished gentleman from Wisconsin making his speech, in which he said that most of the Republicans voted for it. I know that I did not and that very few Republicans did. I said that it was repudiation. I have sent for the RECORD, and here it is. As a great Democrat once said, "Let's look at the record." There were 98 votes cast against it and 80 were Republicans. We argued that it was unconstitutional, un-American, and revolutionary at the time of its passage.

I am against the present resolution because it is repudiation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman yield, I want to ask him one question?

Mr. MILLARD. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does not the gentleman know that the Supreme Court has declared that it is constitutional?

Mr. MILLARD. I do not know any such thing. I will leave it to the Members of the House as to what the decision of the Supreme Court was.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does not the gentleman know that that was the decision?

Mr. MILLARD. I do not know any such thing.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLARD. Yes.

Mr. REILLY. Has the gentleman the record of the votes on the N. I. R. A. and the A. A. A.?

Mr. MILLARD. I have not.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLARD. Yes.

Mr. HOLLISTER. That is the vote on the A. A. A. It was title III of the Agricultural Adjustment Act. That is the title that included the devaluation of the dollar clause. The gentleman is quoting from the vote on the final passage of the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

Mr. MILLARD. Yes. That is all I wanted to bring to the attention of the House, to correct the statement made by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last four words. The argument on the minority side this afternoon impresses me as simply being a continuation of a manifest effort to continue to persuade the country that this administration and its financial policy is attempting to send the country to damnation. It is essentially a repetition of a chain letter that is being sent over the country now, apparently pushed by those interested in this policy.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARLAN. I cannot yield. That chain letter calls attention to the fact that during the last 4 years it is alleged that this administration has spent as much money as was spent in 124 years from 1789 to 1913. The figures amount to $24,000,000,000 in each case. I have not checked up definitely the first 124 years, but the figures as to the last 4 years, to the best of my knowledge, are about two and a half billion dollars in exaggeration of the actual expenditures.

This exaggeration is explained by the fact that the total estimate contains an estimate of eight and one-half billion dollars for 1935, which we now know to be one billion two hundred million in excess. It also contains eight and one-half billion dollars as the Budget for 1936. We know that the actual expenditures for 1936 will not be as great as they were for 1935, so that the surplus of these two estimates over the actual expenditures will be between two and one-half and three billion dollars.

This $24,000,000,000 also contains one and one-half billions for "debt retirement." When it is recalled that $20,000,000,000 of the national debt was incurred before the Roosevelt administration, certainly Roosevelt ought not be charged with that retirement. It contains interest on that debt amounting to two and one-half billion dollars. It contains one billion eight hundred million expenditures for World War veterans. This administration was not responsible for the World War. It also contains an expenditure of two billion three hundred million for loans and investments in bank stocks. These loans represent an actual present value of one hundred cents on the dollar and ought not be charged against running expenses of the Government. Thus the twenty-four billion, after being reduced to twenty-two billion, to approximate the facts, contains over eight billion more for which this administration ought not be charged as expenditures and leaves approximately $14,000,000,000 as the expenditures of the administration during its first 3 years.

One factor this canard leaves out is that from 1913 up until 1933 this Government expended $95,000,000,000. In other words, in those 20 years, covering three Republican and one Democratic Presidents, the Government spent four times as much money as we had expended in the prior 124 years.

In 1913 we stepped into a new era. Thirty-three billion dollars of the ninety-five billion dollars which this canard leaves out was due to the World War. The other sixty-two billion was due to the cost of government. If you divide the $62,000,000,000 spent from 1913 to 1933 and compare that with the operating expenditures of the Government in the Roosevelt administration, there is nothing to get very much excited about. Remember also that the public-works expenditures of this administration represent an increase in value of governmental property; and when you take all that into consideration, such propaganda reduces mostly to a lot of bunk.

In this canard also there are some statements accusing the President of insincerity because during the campaign he criticized the Republicans for extravagance. It includes clippings of speeches which President Roosevelt made during the campaign of 1932. This campaign had been made at the close of a year in which the Federal Government without spending a penny for human rehabilitation or relief, without advancing a dime to save home owners from losing their homes, in short, without doing anything other than merely conducting government, paying out subsidies to the air mail carriers, salaries to hosts of needless Federal employees, and expenses of bureau and commissions which did nothing progressive. President Roosevelt, in criticizing this kind of government, said that such extravagance must stop.

In fact, the Democratic platform criticized this kind of governmental expenditures for this type of government, and it promised to reduce such expenditures 25 percent, which it did during the first year of the Roosevelt administration.

However, the Democratic platform also promised:

First, the extension of Federal credit to the States to provide unemployment relief.

Second, the expansion of the Federal program of necessary and useful construction.

Third, a recognition of responsibility of Government for human welfare, especially for the protection of children.

These were all new ideas to those who had administered Government before, and it was in this new field that the additional expenditures of the Roosevelt administration have been placed. This was the field that so far as it had been cultivated at all was cared for by funds out of community-chest contributions and local and State charities. With the advent of the Roosevelt administration such sources of relief had become exhausted and it was a proposition either of discontinuing this work completely, turning people out to starve, turning young men into vagabonds, and permitting foreclosures and bankruptcies everywhere, or the Federal Government had to assume the responsibility which the Democratic platform promised to assume.

This the Roosevelt administration did, and there is not the slightest difference between the statements that the President made prior to his election, criticizing a condition that existed then, and the action of his administration after his election in carrying out the promises of the Democratic platform.

If a man of limited income spends a thousand dollars supplying himself with luxuries in his everyday life, he is guilty of extravagance; but if he spends many times that amount in looking after sickness in his family, in repairing his property after a fire, or in extending charity to those in need, he cannot be charged with extravagance. That illustration sets forth the difference between the Hoover and the Roosevelt administrations.

The first administration was squandering the Federal funds in an inefficient, drifting government, helpless to handle the problems before it because it had no vision and no courage. The latter type of expenditures represents the Roosevelt administration—meeting this world depression with courage and hope and willing to take unlimited risks to protect our people from want and despair.

It is going to take more than the dissemination of a lot of chain letters with no signatures, with their appeal to the ignorant and superstitious, to undermine the affection which the people have in their hearts for this man who is our President, who is not superhuman and who possibly and probably has made mistakes, but who is the world's greatest leader at the present time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman begins, will he yield for a question?

Mr. RICH. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. I ask the gentleman to yield in order that I might remind the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARLAN], who referred to the chain letter, that inasmuch as the House is not familiar with all of the details of the chain letter, he should include it as a part of his extension of remarks, so that the speech will be complete and we will all understand it.

Mr. HARLAN. I might do that. I will help the gentleman out in his publicity.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto be closed in 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARLAN], who just left the floor, will look at the Treasury statement of July 15 and notice the statement of the Treasury 3 years ago, he will not make the statement he made on the floor just now, that the Government has only gone into the red two billion and a half dollars. It is an erroneous statement. All he needs to do is to refer to the statement issued by the United States Treasury Department; these he receives at his office each day.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. How much has the Government gone behind in the last 3 years, according to that statement? How much has the national debt increased?

Mr. RICH. It was $16,000,000,000, and it is shown on the statement here that on July 15, 1935, it amounts to $29,177,786,318.78.

But when the Democrats devalued the dollar, they charged off $2,000,000,000, which makes it over $31,000,000,000, the greatest debt of any nation in the history of the world, and the past 2 years at the greatest rate of indebtedness in the history of the Nation in peace time. So you see the gentleman from Ohio was in error.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] has expired.

The pro forma amendments were withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. Any consent which the United States may have given to the assertion against it of any right, privilege, or power whether by way of suit, counterclaim, set-off, recoupment, or other affirmative action or defense in its own name or in the name of any of its officers, agents, agencies, or instrumentalities in any proceeding of any nature whatsoever heretofore or hereafter commenced, upon any bond, note, certificate of indebtedness, Treasury bill, or other similar obligation for the repayment of money or for interest thereon made, issued, or guaranteed by the United States or upon any coin or currency of the United States or upon any claim or demand arising out of any surrender, requisition, seizure, or acquisition of any such coin or currency or of any gold or silver, is withdrawn.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOLLISTER: Page 3, line 24, strike out the period and add the following: "where in any such suit, counterclaim, set-off, or recoupment, or other affirmative action or defense, the holder of any such obligation demands the payment of gold, or bases a claim on the failure to pay gold on such obligation, or on the interest thereon, or claims to have been damaged because of any such surrender, requisition, seizure or acquisition, or claims that the value of any such obligation, or of any interest coupon thereon, exceeds its face value in dollars."

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I have tried to make this amendment as simple as possible. I have tried to use the language which is in section 2, to which it is an amendment, so that it would not involve the complete redrafting of the section.

Section 2, in its present form, withdraws the consent that the Government has given to be sued, or to set up any counterclaim which might be asserted against the Government, on any obligation of the Government for the repayment of money, whether a direct or an indirect one. This amendment restricts the withdrawal of such consent to those cases where there is a claim of damage for the failure to pay gold, or a claim of lack of consideration for the failure to pay gold, or a question of damage for confiscation of gold. I have tried in this amendment, and I think I have covered it, to raise directly before the committee, the issue of whether this committee wants to withdraw the right of any holder of any obligation to sue the Government on that obligation, whether it contain a gold clause or not, or whether the committee solely wishes in this legislation to cover the question of so-called "unjust enrichment", because of a claim for an additional amount of money over and above the par value of bonds, or because of some claim for damage for the confiscation of gold. I have tried to raise that issue directly, because I cannot understand how it is that sane people will present a bill in this form, when there is no necessity of going as far as this bill has gone.

I am putting behind me now the question of whether or not any taking away of jurisdiction is or is not a wise thing to do. That, of course, will come up on the question of final passage of the bill. What I am accentuating now to the members of the committee is the issue, "What are you trying to do in this legislation?" Are you trying to see that no one can take advantage of the fact that the dollar has been devalued or that gold has been confiscated, to make a profit out of the Government, or do you actually mean to say that, irrespective of the question of the gold clause, no one may hereafter have his contract with the Government interpreted or have his contract adjudicated in a court of law?

If the committee wishes to go that far, my amendment should be voted down. If the committee solely wishes to cover the question of devaluation or confiscation which every Member on the Democratic side has discussed today, then my amendment should be accepted. I have listened intently to every single speaker on the Democratic side of the House today, hoping against hope that someone would explain to me why it is that this bill goes beyond the question of the necessities of the so-called "gold-clause case." Everybody has made impassioned pleas against undermining the credit of the Government and against asking for $1,600 when you are only entitled to $1,000. Everybody has talked about what an unconscionable thing it is to sue the Government under such circumstances. This amendment covers that. Nobody on the Democratic side has explained why it is we are asked now to withdraw all right in a holder of, say a Home Owners' Loan Corporation bond, for instance, which does not have the gold clause, to have the Government guaranty enforced sometime in the future. Why should we take away the right of that person to go into court and enforce that obligation, merely for the face value of the bond or for the interest on the bond?

This amendment raises that question directly, and if you agree that that is the issue, you should vote for this amendment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER] has expired.

Mr. AMLIE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, 3 years ago I had occasion to advise a client, a woman who had been left a widow, and whose estate consisted of about $5,000, which was deposited in three local banks. Practically all of her investments in bonds and securities had become worthless, and she had no further desire to invest in paper of any kind. This was when the Republicans were still in power, and it was legal to advise a client to simply invest her money in gold, which I did. [Applause.] The bankers told her that I was crazy, but she thought perhaps she had better take my advice in part, so she did put $1,000 in gold in a safety box. She had the balance of her money in three banks. They all failed.

Mr. BIERMANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AMLIE. I do not have time.

Mr. BIERMANN. Those failures were under the Republicans, too.

Mr. AMLIE. That is true.

She has no alternative now but to turn in this gold and accept currency on the basis of a devaluation of these gold dollars to 59 cents on the dollar. I arranged by stipulation to have her case continued, until certain other cases involving the same question should have been decided by the United States Supreme Court. I could have taken her case up on appeal, but I had no desire to embarrass the administration, because I was essentially in sympathy with what the administration was trying to do.

I realize now that I did not give this woman the best kind of advice 3 years ago. I, of course, knew at that time that Hoover would be defeated and that Roosevelt would be elected as the next President of the United States. But I did not realize at that time that if he were elected that his administration would follow a course that would confiscate a part of the holdings of a small investor and protect the holdings of the large investors. I should have advised her to have invested her money in the common stock of the Homestake Mining Co. of South Dakota, the largest gold-mining company in the United States.

At the time that this woman converted $1,000 into gold currency she had a perfect right to do so. Gold was a commodity, and she had as much right to convert it into gold as into brass, copper, silver, or anything else. And when this gold dollar came to be worth $1.69 the Government of the United States ordered her to turn this gold dollar and accept $1 of United States currency, or be prosecuted as a criminal.

But supposing this woman had invested her money in Mr. William Randolph Hearst's Homestake gold-mine stock, her investment would have gone up 435 percent as against the peak price of 1929. But, then, it was hard for any mere lawyer in 1932, listening to the campaign speeches of the Democratic candidate for the Presidency, to realize that laws would be enacted by that group when elevated to power that would reduce a widow's investment of $1,000 in gold by 41 percent and would increase Mr. Hearst's investment of $1,000 in a gold-mining company by 435 percent as against the peak of 1929.

It is contended by the majority leaders that it is not confiscation to require this woman to turn in this $1,000 in gold and accept $1,000 in currency devalued to 59 cents on the dollar. They argue that this current dollar is legal tender and that it has a purchasing power as great as a gold dollar had before the depression. Very well! Why not pass a law confiscating 75 percent of the stock of the Homestake gold mine? The remaining 25 percent of the stock will be worth more than the whole was worth in 1929. Mr. Hearst would still be better off than he was in 1929.

But the fallacy of this line of argument is exposed by Secretary of the Treasury Morganthau when he states that the United States Treasury has realized a profit of two and one-half billion dollars as the result of gold devaluation on the part of the Federal Government. If the Federal Treasury has realized a profit of $2,500,000 by devaluation to 59 cents on the dollar, why not devaluate to a few cents on the dollar and make a profit of a hundred billion dollars for the United States Treasury? If this is accomplished at the expense of no one, not even the one compelled to turn in his gold, surely this is the solution for our economic difficulties that we have all been looking for. It is the pholosopher's stone. It is perpetual motion.

As I see it, the Government has the right to call in all the gold in the country. The sovereign has the right to call in anything that the safety of the sovereign may require. But under the Constitution of the United States the sovereign can commandeer what the sovereign may require for its safety, be it brass, copper, silver, gold, or what have you, only by paying the full market value for it. If the Congress of the United States in its infinite wisdom should require that in order to appease the gods of depression that all the empty beer bottles in the land be gathered together and stored under the dome of the National Capitol, then the Congress of the United States would be the sole judge of the wisdom of this requirement; but under the Constitution of the United States the Congress would have no right to require that the owners of these beer bottles turn them over without being compensated for their reasonable market value.

A great deal has been said this afternoon about the subject of repudiation. This is a matter of policy to be determined by the Congress of the United States. The Congress has the power to refuse petitioners the right to sue the Government of the United States. But as far as any prospective litigants are concerned we are not doing them any disfavor by refusing them permission to bring suit. Under present economic conditions, neither this Congress nor any succeeding Congress would authorize and provide for the payment of any judgment that might be rendered against the United States on any of these gold obligations.

But when we come to the taking away from a woman of $1,000 in gold and paying her for this gold at a price that is 59 percent of the world price for gold; and at a price that is 59 percent of what the Homestake gold mine is paid for its gold, then there is no question but that this is confiscation within the clear meaning of the Constitution of the United States.

Mention has been made on the floor of the gold-clause decision of the Supreme Court, but then I think that we are all agreed that this situation was fully summed up by Mr. O. W. Sprague, one time adviser to the United States Treasury, when he stated many months before that decision was rendered, that—

> If there had been only one or two hundred million dollars involved the Supreme Court would find the gold-clause law unconstitutional, but since there is $100,000,000,000 involved the Supreme Court would not dare do so.

I intend to support this measure, but I feel that we ought to do away with the sophistry and the intellectual dishonesty that has characterized the arguments that have been given in support of this measure. I am willing to go along on a measure that would take away from a widow 41 percent of her thousand dollars in gold and deny to her the right to bring suit; because after all what is the right of any individual to bring suit against the sovereign for 41 percent of a thousand dollars in gold but a meaningless gesture.

I am willing to go along on this measure, because I recognize that we are setting the precedent for the disallowance of the absentee ownership of the 2 percent of our population who own 70 percent of the Nation's total wealth.

I am willing to go along on this measure, because we are setting a precedent that will stand the rank and file of the common people in good stead at some time in the not distant future. Our next step must be the revision of the Constitution in such a manner as to make it possible for the elected representatives of the people to make the will of the majority the law of the land.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the act of June 5, 1933, was to establish a monetary policy in this country which it was hoped would prevent the confiscation of the homes, the farms, and the property of the citizens of this country by undue and unjust exactions on the part of bondholders and others composing the creditor class of the Nation.

The pending bill is necessary if the act of June 5, 1933, is to become effective; and, for one, I do not hesitate to say that as a Member of this House, had I opposed the act of June 5, 1933, I would support this measure in view of the effort to embarrass the Government and to nullify that law.

Not a Member here will contend that we ought to remove all restrictions and permit suits by everybody against the Government. Time and time again bills have been introduced in Congress to permit recourse to the Court of Claims to recover damages growing out of the Civil War; but all such bills have been repudiated in the Congress just as they would be repudiated this afternoon by gentlemen opposing this measure were they under consideration by the House and without any regard to the moralities of any case that might be involved.

It is contended that this proposal should be limited to obligations payable in gold. Why invite annoyance, expense, and harassment to the Government by one class of its citizens? Where is the necessity for having any obligations of the Government for the repayment of money passed upon by the courts when all the bonds of the Government are written documents which disclose definitely the amount of the obligation of the Government? Why invite suits at law or in the Court of Claims which can only annoy and harass the Government?

Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section——

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I am sure he does not want to cut us off completely.

Mr. STEAGALL. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should like 5 minutes.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 5 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to prevent unjust enrichment, if you want to denominate it "unjust enrichment", from the devaluation of gold. It prevents the holders of gold-clause bonds from suing and collecting the difference between the old value of the bond and the present value of the bond. It does exactly what the President said he wanted done in his message of June 27. When that message was read to the House every one of us thought a bill would be introduced for the purpose of preventing suits for the difference between the present and the old values of the gold-clause bonds. The press thought that was what the President wanted; and the people of this Nation, not only because of the press reports, not only because of the President's message, but also because of speeches on this floor today, have a right to believe that all this bill does is to prevent unjust, unnecessary, and unwarranted suits by these people who might want to enrich themselves at the expense of others.

I am taking your word for that. This amendment does all of that. It goes no farther. It leaves us in a situation where if there is any question concerning a Home Owners' Loan Corporation bond, a Farm Credit Administration bond, a T. V. A. bond, or a nongold bond, we can go into court and get an interpretation. Understand that with industrial bonds the conditions under which the bond is given are printed in very plain language upon the face of each bond. In Government securities the conditions are set forth by reference only. In other words, on the face of a Government security you will find reference to a large number of statutes. You have to go to the law in order to find out what the conditions of that obligation are.

It is not fair. It is not just. It is not American. It is not maintaining the three distinct branches of government, which keep a check and balance on one another, to deprive the holders of those bonds of the opportunity to secure a judicial interpretation of what the law is behind those obligations. It is not democratic. It is not in accordance with the policy of the Democratic Party of checks and balances in government. It is not fair. I do not think this House wants to do anything that is undemocratic and which will tend to break down the system of checks and balances, recognized and put into operation by the great forebear of the Democratic Party. We over here do not believe so, and we agree with Thomas Jefferson in that respect, and hope you on the other side will follow the doctrine advocated by Thomas Jefferson, that the judiciary should always be in a position where it may interpret the acts passed by the legislative branch of the Government. All we want to do here is to maintain that system of checks and balances.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HOLLISTER) there were—ayes 59, noes 96.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. No sums, whether heretofore or hereafter appropriated or authorized to be expended, shall be available for, or expended in, payment upon securities, coins, or currencies of the United States except on an equal and uniform dollar for dollar basis.

SEC. 4. As used in this resolution the phrase "gold clause" means a provision contained in or made with respect to an obligation payable in money of the United States which purports to give the obligee a right to require payment in gold, or in a particular kind of coin or currency of the United States, or in an amount in money of the United States measured thereby, declared to be against public policy by Public Resolution No. 10 of June 5, 1933; and the phrase "securities of the United States" means the domestic public debt obligations of the United States, including bonds, notes, certificates of indebtedness, and Treasury bills.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the preamble.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas in order to maintain the uniform value of all coins and currencies of the United States, Public Resolution No. 10 of June 5, 1933, declared provisions known as "gold clauses" to be against public policy, prohibited their use in obligations thereafter incurred, and provided that money of the United States legal tender for obligations generally was legal tender for all obligations with or without gold clauses; and

Whereas the unmatured security issues of the United States are domestic issues offered to the people of the United States, payable only in the United States and in the money of the United States, and underlie our national monetary system and credit structure, with the result that disparity in these security issues or in our coins and currencies would undermine that system and structure; and

Whereas the United States has paid and will continue to pay to the holders of all its securities their principal and interest, dollar for dollar, in money of the United States; has maintained and will continue to maintain the parity of all forms of such money; and has thus afforded and will continue to afford full security and strict equality of advantage to all holders of its money and securities; and

Whereas no holder of any of the money or securities of the United States has suffered any damage because of the measures heretofore taken to maintain such security and equality of advantage; and any speculative holding of or dealing in the money or securities of the United States to take advantage of the Government's fixed policy to continue such certain and uniform treatment is incompatible with the public interest: Now, therefore, be it.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the preamble, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOLLISTER: Strike out the preamble and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Whereas because of the devaluation of the United States dollar by executive order of January 31, 1934, and because of the surrender, requisition, seizure, or acquisition of gold and gold certificates by various other executive orders, certain holders of "gold clause" obligations of the United States, as hereinafter defined, have instituted or threatened to institute damage suits against the United States Government based on such devaluation or confiscation, or are attempting or threatening to attempt to assert by way of counterclaim, set-off, or recoupment claims for damages against the United States Government based on such devaluation or such surrender, requisition, seizure, or acquisition."

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, in this amendment I am merely trying to save the committee from doing a vain and foolish thing. The committee has determined on the form of the resolution. I am merely trying to change the preamble so that the resolution and the preamble will be more or less coordinated.

The preamble contains a great many things which do not belong in the resolution and have no connection therewith. In the amendment I am offering to strike out the preamble and insert in lieu thereof the language which the Clerk has just read, I refer to the fact that suits have been instituted, and that suits are threatened, that they are based on devaluation, confiscation, and so forth. That preliminary statement is sufficient to cover the resolution.

The preamble as it reads now, as I stated previously this afternoon, bases its first paragraph on a resolution of the Congress which was held unconstitutional by 8 of the 9 Members of the Supreme Court. In the second paragraph it refers to how disparity in security issues undermines national credit, which does not mean anything at all, because we have disparity in our security issues at the present time, such as disparity in the interest rate, disparity in maturity, disparity in tax exemptions, and disparity in perhaps other things.

The third paragraph contains a number of statements about what the United States is doing and will continue to do, which nobody in the world can possibly predict at the present time, particularly when this kind of legislation is being enacted. The last paragraph states that nobody has suffered a loss because of any monetary action which the Government has taken. Whether that is so or not cannot be ascertained if no one can go into court and prove it. If we are taking away that right by the enactment of this bill, what is the use of making a statement that nobody has suffered a loss? As a matter of fact, there was a fear that somebody would suffer a loss, otherwise we would not be faced with this measure. Someone feared that bondholders would go into court and prove that they had suffered loss.

Mr. Chairman, I merely ask that this stump speech, which expresses a lot of pious hopes, and which states a great many things not true, and which is further based on an unconstitutional statute to begin with, be stricken out and a simple preamble accepted covering the case a great deal better than the one now contained in the bill.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the Hollister amendment, striking out all after the words "strike out the preamble" in the Hollister amendment, so that my amendment will read "strike out the preamble."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MICHENER: Strike out the preamble.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan should properly come after there has been a disposition of the pending amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. MICHENER. It was my thought the preamble could be amended in this way, or that I could offer it as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. No; there is a substitute pending offered by the gentleman from Ohio for the preamble contained in the resolution.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SNELL. I thought that a motion to amend or strike out the preamble should come after the consideration of the bill had been completed and the bill engrossed.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rules the preamble is read for amendment and the title of the resolution remains and will be considered.

Mr. SNELL. It was my thought after the bill was engrossed the preamble was stricken.

The CHAIRMAN. That is true where there is a title and a preamble.

Mr. SNELL. Is not that the situation here?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not; at any rate, we have begun the consideration of the preamble and an amendment is pending.

The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, as I understand, I do not lose my right to offer an amendment striking out the entire preamble.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HOLLISTER) there were—ayes 55, noes 104.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman I move to strike out the preamble.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MICHENER moves to strike out the preamble.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, I offer this motion for a number of reasons. In the first place, the preamble is no part of the law. It has no probative force or effect. There is nothing in a statute which has any such effect before the resolving clause.

It has been held time and again that a preamble preceding a law is, in plain language, nothing more or less than a stump speech giving the reasons and the arguments for that which might be considered unusual, unprecedented, and extraordinary.

I concede that the legislation enacted during the last few months has been unusual, unprecedented, and hard to explain and that, possibly, it might have been advisable to have inserted a stump speech or preamble as a part of the legislation enacted, to give it any justification whatever, but I contend that this Congress should not clutter up the statutes with stump speeches of this kind. What would be the result if we inserted a preamble before every law enacted?

I think we all understand what this legislation is. Of course, I am not going to vote for it, because I do not believe we should take from the courts the right to interpret any contract made between individuals or between the Government and its citizens. In the attempted reformation of our Government under the present administration we have been gradually taking away from the individual citizen the rights which he has always cherished as being secured to him by a republican form of government.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. I do not yield.

It has been said that the king can do no wrong. In a democracy the individual is presumed to have rights different than in an autocracy. It is a fundamental principle of our jurisprudence that the citizen should have some right of redress if his property rights are affected by governmental action or if the Government fails to fulfill an obligation for which it is legally liable. To repeat, if a citizen has a right, and that right has been violated, the laws of this country have heretofore and should continue to afford him a remedy. Why should we compel individuals to live up to their contracts but exempt the Government?

One of our courts has said, in substance, that the very essence of civil liberty consists in the right of every individual to claim the protection of the law whenever he receives an injury. We have always adhered to the policy and the principle that one of the first duties of government is to afford that protection.

Under Supreme Court holdings those whose rights are taken away in this proposed legislation admittedly have legal rights, but this bill boldly and brazenly deprives them of any method whereby they may enforce those rights. Possibly we have the power, but it is un-American to use it.

To pass this legislation makes the credit of the United States a mockery. If this is not repudiation, then what is it? What you are going to do when you pass this bill is to say to these individuals, "We recognize you have a claim, but we deny you the right to submit that claim."

Shame on any Government that repudiates its own obligations, and shame on all Government officials, and those charged with responsibility, who are a party to bringing about a condition where any citizen is denied his day in court. We say that a man's word is as good as his bond. If this bill becomes a law, what shall we say of the word or the bond of our own Government?

During the recent past, Congress has been setting up innumerable boards and bureaus. We have been delegating power heretofore undreamed of to the Executive and to these boards and bureaus. The Executive and, in many cases, these board and bureau chiefs hold in the hollow of their hands the liberty and property rights of many of our citizens. Humble though he be, I still insist that every person owing allegiance to our flag is entitled to a square deal from his Government and not the kind of a new deal sought in this measure.

Do you realize that in many instances these boards and bureaus are able to make rules and regulations having the force of law? Some of them are able to issue bonds pledging the credit of their own authority plus the credit of the United States itself. Yet, anyone dealing with the authority pledging this credit will be denied the right to legal interpretation of their agreements in any court of law. This is bureaucracy gone wild. It is dictatorship unrestrained.

Some have had the hardihood to urge that the word "repudiation" has no place in connection with this legislation. They say that there is no question of morals involved. To make a promise and then to refuse to keep that promise, just because one cannot be compelled to fulfill is bad morals.

In the sinking-fund cases the Court said:

The United States are as much bound by their contracts as are individuals. If they repudiate their obligations, it is as much repudiation, with all the wrong and reproach that term implies, as it would be if the repudiator had been a State or a municipality or a citizen.

It has been argued here that it was unthinkable that the Government would not pay its obligations when due. Not many months ago we could have asserted with reasonable assurance that this Government would never have repudiated the gold clause in its bonds, and that this Government would never have denied the citizen with a gold certificate the right to go to the Treasury and get the gold to which he was entitled under the law. Things are different today. Quite evidently those in authority do not have the same respect for contracts and obligations made by our Government as has been wont to obtain with those in authority down through the years. It is unfair and cannot be too strongly condemned.

If this bill becomes a law and if we want to be candid, every security, bond, or obligation issued by the Government or any of its agencies in the future should contain a clause providing that the holder under no condition will have any redress in the event that the interest on the obligation is not paid, or that its face value is not paid at maturity. This will be the truth, and why should our Government not print the truth, especially on its financial obligations?

This bill is misnamed, and a better title would be "A validation of repudiation." The administration insists on this legislation. There are sufficient followers in this body to grant the request, but the time will come when the country will regret this action. The time has arrived now when we should stop, look, and listen. We can protest against the holders of gold-clause bonds making profits without this far-reaching action. The Hollister amendment, which was voted down, would have taken care of that. It is too bad that this body is still willing to pass bills prefaced by the departments, and is still willing to accept the mandate that no changes must be made in the bills.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the preamble and all amendments thereto do now close.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the preamble.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK].

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the preamble and all amendments thereto do now close.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I have been recognized, but I will yield to the gentleman from Alabama to move to close debate in 5 minutes.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the preamble and all amendments thereto close in 5 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] has made a charge of repudiation, and my purpose in rising is to answer the gentleman, that the withdrawal of the right to sue by a sovereign does not involve repudiation.

When the gentleman makes the charge of repudiation under such circumstances, he ignores a long line of court decisions, decisions of the Supreme Court coming down to Lynch against United States, reported in Two Hundred and Ninety-second United States Reports. In this case the Court, in passing upon this question, said:

It is fundamental in the law of the land that the Government cannot be sued without its permission, and it is equally fundamental that the sovereign body, the Government, if it grants permission to sue, grants a privilege which it can withdraw at any time.

I am going to insert a long line of decisions and a discussion going back to the Constitutional Convention, showing that the question was discussed in that great body, and the broad principle that the sovereign cannot be sued without its consent, and that the sovereign can withdraw it without its being considered repudiation.

In Lynch v. United States (292 U. S. 571) the Court says:

Although consent to sue is thus given when the policy issued, Congress retains power to withdraw the consent at any time. For consent to sue the United States is a privilege accorded; not the grant of a property right protected by the fifth amendment. The consent may be withdrawn, although given after much deliberation and for a pecuniary consideration (De Groot v. United States (5 Wall, 419, 432)). Compare Darrington v. State Bank (13 How. 12, 17), Beers v. Arkansas (20 How. 527–529), Gordon v. United States (7 Wall. 188, 195), Railroad Co. v. Tennessee (101 U. S. 337), Railroad Co. v. Alabama (101 U. S. 832), In re Ayers (123 U. S. 443, 505), Hans v. Louisiana (134 U. S. 1, 17), Baltzer v. North Carolina (161 U. S. 240), Baltzer & Taaks v. North Carolina (161 U. S. 246). The sovereign's immunity from suit exists whatever the character of the proceeding or the source of the right sought to be enforced. It applies alike to causes of action arising under acts of Congress (De Groot v. United States (5 Wall. 419, 431), United States v. Babcock (250 U. S. 328, 331)), and to those arising from some violation of rights conferred upon the citizens by the Constitution (Schillinger v. United States (155 U. S. 163, 166, 168)). The character of the cause of action—the fact that it is in contract as distinguished from tort—may be important in determining (as under the Tucker Act) whether consent to sue was given. Otherwise, it is of no significance. For immunity from suit is an attribute of sovereignty which may not be bartered away.

Mere withdrawal of consent to sue on policies for yearly renewable term insurance would not imply repudiation. When the United States creates rights in individuals against itself, it is under no obligation to provide a remedy through the courts (United States v. Babcock (250 U. S. 328, 331)). It may limit the individual to administrative remedies (Tutun v. United States (270 U. S. 568, 576)). And withdrawal of all remedy, administrative as well as legal, would not necessarily imply repudiation. So long as the contractual obligation is recognized, Congress may direct its fulfillment without the interposition of either a court or an administrative tribunal.

That is what the Supreme Court said in this case. The substance of the decision is that the right to sue a sovereign body, a government, is a privilege granted by the government. If we were to have any other course, that right could be used to impair the effectiveness of government itself. Where government has given a right to sue, which is a privilege, the Government can withdraw that privilege without its action being construed as a repudiation. Whatever other arguments may be made against this resolution, and with which I am not in agreement, they cannot be predicated upon the ground of repudiation. [Applause.]

In laying this matter before Congress the President in the title referred to a joint resolution authorizing the exchange of certain securities, coins, and currencies of the United States; withdrawing the right to sue the United States on its bonds and other similar obligations. Section 2 of the same bill reads:

Any consent which the United States may have given to the assertion against it of any right, privilege, or power, whether by way of suit, counterclaim, set-off, recoupment, or other affirmative action or defense * * * is withdrawn.

There are always men in every community who devote themselves to harsh criticism of the administration in power. Nothing ever goes right with these men; everything is wrong. Recently one of this class has made a virulent attack upon the President because of his advocacy that the United States would withdraw its consent to be sued in certain cases. On the other hand, we have a man of the same type, who is loudly complaining about the law's delay, particularly in our Court of Claims.

The law's delay is an austere matter of comment in every State in the Union, having served as a chronic cause of criticism for centuries. Shakespeare puts the law's delay in the same class with "the oppressor's wrong, the proud man's contumely, the pangs of despised love, * * * the insolence of office."

It is difficult to reconcile critics, whether of fear or of unreasoning opposition, both illogical.

On the one hand a man complains about the President withdrawing the right to sue, at the same time unable to understand that such action will prevent congestion of litigation in our courts; and the other man, who complains of congestion and paralysis in the Court of Claims, unwilling to recognize that delays in that court may be accounted for by the unwillingness or inability of the plaintiff to proceed rather than failure of the Government to respond.

It is universally recognized as the law of nations that a sovereign may not be sued without its consent. The principle is based upon that well-understood agreement among all States to respect the absolute authority of every sovereign. On June 8, 1788, George Mason, in the Virginia State convention, said:

> It would be ludicrous to say you could put a State's body in jail. How is the judgment then to be enforced? A power which cannot be executed ought not to be granted.

In the celebrated case of Chisholm against Georgia, reported in Second Dallas, 478, in 1793, Chief Justice John Jay said:

> I may suggest an important difference between suing a State and suing the United States. It is this: In all cases of actions against States or individual citizens the national courts are supported in all their legal and constitutional proceedings by the arm of the Executive power of the United States, but in cases against the United States itself, there is no power which the courts can call to their aid.

Perhaps the most important case reported in our Court on this subject is that of the schooner Exchange (7 Cranch, 116 (1812)). When this case was reported, Chief Justice Marshall had no precedents to follow, but by the application of a vigorous mtellect unsurpassed in the history of the law and by the analysis of principles he arrived at a decision which has stood the test of a century and a quarter. Marshall said, among many other things, representing wisdom in perfected form:

> The jurisdiction of the Nation within its own territory is necessarily exclusive and absolute. Any restriction upon it deriving validity from an external source would imply a diminution of its sovereignty to the extent of that restriction.

In January 1834, United States v. Clarke (8 Peters 443), Marshall said:

> As the United States are not suable of common right, the party who institutes such suit must bring his case within the authority of some act of Congress or the Court cannot exercise jurisdiction over it.

Fifty years later the Supreme Court of Massachusetts decided the case of Briggs v. Light-Boats (11 Allen 157 (1865)). An attempt was made to place a lien upon some light-boats being built for the United States Government in a Massachusetts shipyard, when process was halted by the court, saying:

> A sovereign cannot be sued in his own courts without his consent, not because a sovereign cannot always control, but because he must always be free to attend to government business, and the property of the government must always be understood to be intended and used for public purposes.

This ruling has been quoted with approval in the highest courts of England as well as in our own Supreme Court.

Just about 100 years ago, in the Jackson administration, a suit came on to be heard which is worthy of being recalled, not that it touches upon the principle of sovereign immunity, but because it emphasizes what George Mason said in 1788.

In the case of Worcester against Georgia, reported in Sixth Peters, page 515, some missionaries were living among the Cherokee Indians on their reservation in Georgia in violation of a statute made by that State.

The offenders were indicted, tried, convicted of violating the statute, and were sentenced to 4 years in the penitentiary.

By writ of error they got their case before the Supreme Court of the United States, and Judge Marshall decided in their favor, declaring that the Georgia laws were null and void so far as this question was concerned and ruling that the men should be released.

It is the desire of every Government official that all the decisions of our Supreme Court be respected and enforced. The jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is clearly defined by the Constitution. The jurisdiction of all subordinate courts is distinctly set forth by acts of Congress. This matter of immunity from suit has been considered by the ablest minds who have participated in legislative halls and adorned our Supreme Court.

The doctrine illustrates and explains sound reasons of public policy; confusion and danger would follow the adoption of any other rule.

Less than 20 years after Briggs against Light-Boats, supra, the Supreme Court did take jurisdiction of a case, which was the cause of intense feeling in the Court and throughout the country, resulting in a 5-to-4 decision. United States v. Lee (106 U. S. 196 (1882)) involved the title to the estate known as "Arlington." The property had been taken by the United States Government under its war powers, through act of Congress, in 1864. Action was brought by devisees of the original owners to recover the property. Objection was made to the jurisdiction of the Court by the Attorney General of the United States, who insisted that the property was that of the sovereign and employed for public purposes. The Court overruled the Attorney General and decided to hear the merits of the case. The four dissenting judges are generally believed to have exhibited the better reasoning. They brought up, by implication, the same situation that existed in the case of Jackson and the missionaries. The dissenters pointed out that the Court had no authority to render a judgment on which it had no power to issue execution, because to issue execution would be to issue an execution against the United States, to turn the United States out of possession of land held under claim of title and color of right for public purposes, and to maintain a suit with such an object and result is to violate the fundamental principle that the sovereign cannot be sued without its consent, and to encroach upon the powers intrusted by the Constitution to the legislative and executive departments of the Government. Two of the Justices comprising the majority had vigorously asserted in earlier years the doctrine of immunity, but changed their minds on this case.

United States against Lee stands alone as a departure from an unbroken line of correct precedent and later opinions down to the recent opinion of Lynch against United States. A writer in the American Law Review, commenting on this opinion, said:

> Reflect for a moment upon the significance of this ruling. If an action of ejectment were brought for the possession of the White House, the President could not plead in bar to the jurisdiction, possession of the United States; but must, like a private person, defend upon the merits; and in case of adverse judgment must enforce the writ in his own name as President of the United States against himself—to eject himself from possession as President.

By a division of 5 to 4 the Court upheld such a ruling. The minority reasoning was invincible. The sovereign cannot hold property except through agents. To maintain an action to recover property held by its agents is to maintain an action against the sovereign and to invade such possession of the agent by execution is to invade possession of sovereignty and to disregard the fundamental maxim that a sovereign cannot be sued without its consent.

In a California case, People v. Miles (56 Calif. 401 (July 1880)), the Court said decisively:

> The State cannot be sued directly or indirectly as by setting up a counterclaim or set-off, nor can any judgment be entered against the State except when the same is permitted by statute.

Judge Holmes, of revered memory, said (205 U. S. 349):

> A sovereign is exempt from suit, not because of any formal conception or absolute theory, but on the logical and practical ground that there can be no legal right as against the authority that makes the law on which the right depends.

At the October term in 1933, in the case of Monaco v. Mississippi (292 U. S. 320), Chief Justice Hughes discussed the question whether this court has jurisdiction to entertain a suit brought by a foreign state against a State without its consent. That question, he said, not hitherto determined, is now definitely presented.

There is no express provision that the United States may not be sued in the absence of consent.

The contracts between a nation and individuals are only binding on the conscience of the sovereign and have no pretensions to a compulsive force. They confer no right of action independent of the sovereign will. To what purpose would it be to authorize suits against States for the debts they owe? How could recoveries be enforced?

Mr. Chief Justice Hughes, speaking of this immunity of suit, said in Missouri v. Fiske (290 U. S. 18 (1933)):

However important that power (judicial), it cannot extend into the forbidden sphere. Consideration of convenience opens no avenue of escape from the restriction.

He then quoted the emphatic language used in Ex parte New York (256 U. S. 49):

The entire judicial power granted by the Constitution does not embrace authority to entertain a suit brought by private parties against a State without consent given.

Such a suit cannot be entertained upon the ground that the controversy arises under the Constitution or laws of the United States.

Chief Justice White said in Duhne v. New Jersey (251 U. S. 311):

But it has long been settled that the whole sum of the judicial power granted by the Constitution to the United States does not embrace the authority to entertain a suit brought by a citizen against his own State without its consent. (October term, 1919.)

The long lines of Supreme Court opinions clearly show that the charge of "repudiation" is inconsistent with the law. [Applause.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon the preamble and all amendments thereto close in 2 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, merely to state to the Committee that I expect to offer a motion to recommit, which will include the amendment to change the preamble, which has already been presented to the Committee, and the motion which I offered earlier today to add to section 2 so as to limit the withdrawal of the right to sue to a case where the claimant has a gold bond on which he claims damages, or because he claims to be damaged by the confiscation of gold. That will be the motion to recommit which I shall present, and I am explaining it now because the language is somewhat involved.

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan to strike out the preamble.

The question was taken and the motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the Committee will rise.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WHITTINGTON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration House Joint Resolution 348, and, pursuant to House Resolution 300, he reported the joint resolution back to the House.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion to recommit, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HOLLISTER offers the following motion to recommit: Strike out the preamble and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Whereas because of the devaluation of the United States dollar by Executive order of January 31, 1934, and because of surrender, requisition, seizure, or acquisition of gold and gold certificates by various other Executive orders, certain holders of 'gold clause' obligations of the United States, as hereinafter defined, have instituted or threaten to institute damage suits against the United States Government based on such devaluation or confiscation, or are attempting or threatening to attempt to assert by way of counterclaim, set-off, or recoupment claims for damages against the United States Government based on such devaluation or such surrender, requisition, seizure, or acquisition."

And at end of section 2, page 3, line 24, strike out the period and add the following: "where in any such suit, counterclaim, set-off, or recoupment, or other affirmative action or defense, the holder of any such obligation demands the payment of gold, or bases a claim on the failure to pay gold on such obligation, or on the interest thereon, or claims to have been damaged because of any such surrender, requisition, seizure, or acquisition, or claims that the value of any such obligation, or of any interest coupon thereon, exceeds its face value in dollars."

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 92, nays 252, not voting 85, as follows:

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—H. J. RES. 348

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have some pretty well defined and positive notions with respect to the pending measure and all proposed legislation of similar type and purpose, and I propose to go on record as to the same. I regret that a measure of so great importance and involving, as it does, some governmental economic and ethical principles above which even Members of Congress cannot rise, cannot be discussed on the floor of this House or at such length as the importance of the matter with all of it ramifications, stripped of partisan politics, demands and deserves.

I am not so dumb as to fail to realize that from a partisan standpoint this measure will receive sufficient support from the majority as to insure its passage, but my respect for and confidence in the judgment of many of my Democratic friends is such as to warrant the assertion on my part that were sufficient time given for them, as well as others, to outline their objections and the fundamental reasons which motivate them, the vote in favor of this and similar measures would in numbers be considerably reduced.

It is true that the will of the majority will prevail, but it has been well said that laws must be justified by something more than the will of the majority. They must rest on the eternal foundation of righteousness.

The measure under consideration is unrighteous. It undertakes to take away from the individual citizen a right guaranteed to him by law, and is not justified by reason of the fact that a majority sees fit to undertake to deprive them of that right. I am practical minded and old-fashioned, I know; furthermore, the doctrines for which I stand may not be popular with the intellectuals of this day and generation, who think so little of fundamentals and the principles which underlie, but upon which our civilization rests, so also rests the progress which has been made, which progress by the way, compared with what is to be is as a drop of water to the sea.

This legislation is offensive to my sense of fair play and justice. It not only impugns the patriotism of the average citizen but destroys his confidence in his Government. It closes the door to those citizens who might desire to exercise the right to seek to recover through the courts any damage they may have sustained as the result of the devaluation of the dollar and the repudiation of the gold clause in the bonds issued by our Government. It does this, or attempts to do it, notwithstanding that the Supreme Court has held that the Government had exceeded its authority in abrogating the gold clause in its bonds and that the contractual obligation still exists and remains binding upon the conscience of the sovereign.

The proposed legislation attempts to make legal an unconscionable act of "the sovereign" seeking to disregard the elementary principles of fair dealing, to avoid criticism therefor by reliance upon the doctrine that "the king may do no wrong", asking for protection of the Government from the consequences of its own mistaken policies, a doctrine of repudiation and expediency which, if permitted to be established, will forever remain as a blot upon our escutcheon, and one of the most dishonorable acts ever perpetrated upon the American citizens by a bureaucratic, autocratic, and tyrannical group temporarily vested with the power to so oppress.

One cannot help remembering at such a time as this the attitude with which our forbears approached somewhat similar situations involving the honor and integrity of our country. I am reminded of that which Edward Livingstone said as he closed the debate against the so-called "Alien bill," almost 140 years ago. It is worth repeating I believe. Said he:

> If we are ready to violate the Constitution will the people submit to our unauthorized acts? Sir, they ought not to submit—they would deserve the chains that these measures are forging for them * * *. Do not let us be told like the arch traitors we cry "Hail Columbia" at the moment we are betraying her to destruction; that we sing "Happy land" when we are plunging it in ruin and disgrace; that we are absurd enough to call ourselves free and enlightened while we advocate principles that would have disgraced the age of Gothic barbarity.

I believe in the sanctity of a legal contract voluntarily entered into by the parties thereto, and no amount of argument and no fallacious reasoning can change my attitude with respect thereto. The contract is performed or it is repudiated or broken. Its inviolability, based on a meeting of the minds of the parties, is its very essence, and the real reason for its being.

It is axiomatic that the obligation of a contract includes the duty to perform a contract, and the duty to pay damages in case it is not performed. So those of us who remember our law-student days recall that it was impressed upon our minds that the obligations of a valid contract cannot be impaired by any subsequent legislative act. The parties to a contract are entitled to and guaranteed the right of the precise fulfillment of all of its obligations according to their terms. These principles are too well established to permit successful contradiction, and are involved in the controversy with respect to the proposed legislation. We hear much about the sovereignty of the State and the right of the Government to protect itself from suits by citizens. The doctrine of the immunity of the sovereign is invoked to protect the Government against the exercise of a contractual right by those citizens who have entered into a contract with the Government, which contract the Government would now repudiate and set aside on the ground of expediency. Such an attitude and state of mind is incomprehensible; but it is the attitude and state of mind which has motivated this Government of ours with respect to many other contracts which it has made with its citizens. It has been so many times made evident that it has had a deleterious and undermining effect upon the morals of the younger generation to whom today, by reason of the example set by their Government, a contract in writing over their signatures means no more than any other scrap of paper.

The policy the Government has pursued with respect to carrying out its contracts made with citizens is reprehensible, and responsible for more ills which trouble the body politic than any other one thing of which I can now think. Is there no such thing as sancity of a contract now? The inescapable conclusion is that there is none, so far as the Government is concerned, and this proposed legislation is further proof of the fact.

In a democracy sovereignty inheres in the people. Such powers or sovereignty as are possessed by the Federal Government are subordinated to law. As it derives its existence through the law of nature from the eternal law, the immutable principles of reason and justice which call it into being impose upon it certain rules of action which it cannot disregard without its own destruction. It is a well-established principle of law that certain fundamental principles and express provisions define and regulate the powers that may be exercised by the Federal Government in its reliance upon its sovereignty. Obedience to such law may be enforced by the people either by nullifying its action through the courts, or in extraordinary cases by employing means not so pleasant to contemplate.

The philosophy of government responsible for the theory of the divine right of kings was effectively, and as I supposed, permanently relegated, long ago, to that realm of innocuous desuetude to which President Cleveland will be remembered to have referred. Certainly it is un-American, and was unquestionably so decided in 1776.

I am unalterably opposed to this bill. "Sovereignty, it is our belief", said Calvin Coolidge, "is vested in the individual, and we are going to protect the right of the individual."

WORK-RELIEF REGULATIONS

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, this morning I received the following telegram from the chairman of the County Board of Antelope County, Nebr.:

> No Antelope County men working on shelter-belt project in this county. Outside help hired claim on account of our not having Federal relief. We have 400 unemployed men wanting work. Situation is serious. Can you help us?

Upon receipt of the telegram, I telephoned to Mr. Paul H. Roberts, acting director of the plains shelter-belt project, and complained of this situation. Mr. Roberts explained that since the beginning of the new fiscal year, to wit, July 1, 1935, funds for the shelter-belt project had been allotted from the Emergency Works appropriation under regulations requiring the employees of the project to be selected from certified relief rolls. Now, what is the effect of this arrangement in Antelope County, Nebr.? Antelope County is one of a very few counties in the State and in the United States that has displayed the commendable spirit of self-reliance to the point of abandoning Federal relief and making the effort to take care of itself. This does not mean that Antelope County has no relief problem. It does not mean that Antelope County has no unemployment problem. It means that the people of the county are making a man's effort to carry their own load. Instead of receiving commendation and encouragement in this effort, they are now told that the county has no relief roll and that they must witness the importation of nonresidents to take the jobs on Federal projects within the county while 400 of their own unemployed must sit idly by. For all practical purposes, this amounts to the holding forth of an inducement to the counties of the United States to remain charity charges of the Federal Government, and it amounts to the assessment of a direct penalty upon the occasional self-reliant and courageous county that is willing to make the effort to resume independence. We will never clear the Federal relief rolls in this country that way.

Perhaps existing regulations afford no other alternative to what is now being experienced in Antelope County, Nebr. If that be true, it obviously follows that those regulations should be changed so that they shall no longer continue to defeat legitimate and desired purposes. There is no reason, except it be purely arbitrary and artificial, why the unemployed men in Antelope County, Nebr., should not be employed on that part of the shelter-belt project lying within the county in absolute preference to any and all nonresidents.

I apprehend that other Members may have been, or may be, confronted with a similar situation in their districts. I call upon them to join with me in a concerted effort to force due recognition of the rights of local citizens and an administration of public-relief funds that will encourage and foster self-reliance rather than to place an indefinite premium upon the practice of local governmental subdivisions clinging to Federal relief through fear of making independent effort. Such local assumption ought to be stimulated and encouraged, not penalized.

I have taken this matter up with Harry Hopkins, the Relief Administrator, and he has told me that he will look into this matter right away. I know the great problem with which Mr. Hopkins is faced, and I realize that certain regulations must be followed in the administration of a $5,000,000,000 relief fund. But no regulation which penalizes a county which is so patriotic in this hour of our Nation's distress by taking care of its own relief problems is a good regulation. Four hundred unemployed in one county looking for a job in order to take care of their families do not feel very well when they find their Government bringing into that county workers from other counties to take jobs for which they themselves have been searching and to which they are entitled. I am not criticizing Harry Hopkins. I have the greatest respect for him and feel that he has been giving all of his time and energy toward solving a problem through which we are endeavoring to put three and a half million people back to work.

Knowing Mr. Hopkins as I do and learning more about him by personal contacts during the past few months, I have gained much admiration for him. I hope that he will find it possible to eliminate this objectionable regulation over which people in Antelope County are so distressed and which has distressed me as their Representative. Paul Roberts, acting director of the plains shelter-belt project, realizes the unfairness of this regulation. In my conversation with Mr. Roberts he indicated he is helpless to do anything about it. He has similar problems in other States. So I take this opportunity of bringing up this matter to the attention of the Representatives. I feel that it is my duty to tell my colleagues about it. You are entitled to know what is being done in my State, because you undoubtedly have similar problems in your districts, and we as Representatives of the people should do everything in our power to help our people, and by so doing we can bring these matters to the attention of those officials who have the responsibility of administering these vast sums of taxpayers' money.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include therein certain excerpts from the case of Perry against the United States, one of the gold-clause cases decided by the Supreme Court.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

NEW YORK STATE FLOOD

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up House Resolution 298, authorizing the appointment of a committee to investigate waterway conditions in central New York.

The Clerk read the title of the House resolution.

Mr. LORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, a great part of the flooded area covered by this resolution is in my district; practically all of it is in my district and in the district of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COLE].

Mr. Speaker, 2 weeks ago next Sunday night we had the most terrible flood that has ever visited our area. Houses were washed away, families were washed away, barns were destroyed, cattle were washed away, crops were destroyed and washed away, and the whole country round about was devastated.

It has been estimated that it will cost $27,000,000 to restore the damage done this section. Immediately on being notified of this damage I got the Red Cross to go to that section in planes and got the F. E. R. A., the C. W. A., and the P. W. A. interested and to give such relief as they could. The C. C. C. boys have done a good work there in helping clean up the area, but what we are most in need of in restoring the locality to a normal condition is funds. We are getting what we can from the various governmental agencies, but we must have direct grants to restore our bridges and highways, which are damaged far beyond any amount the localities can contribute.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LORD. I yield.

Mr. O'MALLEY. I merely wanted to make the comment that I think the Democrats ought to be very happy that when a Republican district gets in trouble it calls on Democratic alphabetic agencies for help and compliments them for it.

Mr. LORD. Certainly we call on Democratic agencies, and they ought to be as free to help as the Republicans would be. I ask the gentleman if only Democrats are to be aided by Democratic agencies?

Mr. BACON. Does the gentleman contend this is not a national administration?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman think those organizations are for Democrats only?

Mr. LORD. Mr. Speaker, Mr. COLE of New York introduced a bill requesting the Army engineers to make a survey of this section, to estimate the cost and advisability of building dams to control the waters so that such a flood may not occur again. They have made this preliminary survey. Now we need money to rebuild our homes, highways, bridges, restore our farms, and feed and care for the people until they again get located. This help we need and must have it quickly to save them from severe suffering and loss.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is the most unusual investigating resolution I can recall ever having been presented to the House. We all know that flood-control projects are examined by the Secretary of War. Never before in my recollection has a special congressional committee been appointed in reference to flood control. There are approximately 1,500 or 2,000 flood-control projects pending. If we set this precedent today, any Member interested in a similar project could come in and ask for a congressional investigation.

If the gentleman from New York, the author of the resolution, will plainly state that he will withdraw his companion resolution asking funds to pay the expenses of this trip up there, then I shall not object, although I think it is a bad precedent.

If this means the expenditure of one penny, then I shall have to object.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. O'CONNOR. When the gentleman states that this is a flood-control project, I do not know that he is correctly stating the matter. Of course, this involves upstate New York, but, as I understand, the purpose of sending this congressional committee of six with the Army engineers is to get first-hand information within a very few days so that the Congress may be informed as to any relief it might be asked to give. As the gentleman knows, in the case of every flood heretofore we have voted relief, as in the case of Arkansas, Oklahoma, and other States which I do not recall for the moment. These Members will go up there and get first-hand information. Right now there is pending a bill—which it is hoped might be brought up Monday—authorizing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to lend to the political entities up there sufficient money to meet this situation, which all the newspapers and everyone else says is very desperate.

Mr. WARREN. Let us be very frank about this matter. In this particular case the district engineer has already gone up there. He has already made his report and the report has been filed with the National Emergency Council. If they see fit, they may send men in there and remedy the situation tomorrow.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I do not understand that is so. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM] received a wire, which referred to myself. Unfortunately I did not think this matter was coming up until tomorrow. I understand the Army engineers are on the job and Mr. Walker has sent his people up there. The C. C. C. people are up there. The American Legion and the Boy Scouts are on the ground now. I am surprised there has been any report made.

Mr. WARREN. The district engineer has already made his report, which has been transmitted to Mr. Frank Walker. I am just thinking about the precedent that we will establish here in passing this resolution, because I have looked into the question and I never heard of this being done before. If that is true, every Member of the House may come in here and ask for a special congressional investigating committee, headed by himself, on every little pet flood-control project that might come up.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The committee members can go up there Saturday and they ought to be back here Monday morning. I cannot see how the whole thing will cost over $500.

Mr. MEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MEAD. It is my understanding that resolutions adopted by the Rivers and Harbors Committee have the weight and effect of law and authority, so far as the Army Engineers are concerned. The Army Engineers are anxious that some congressional action be taken supplementing their work. They are anxious that the proper committee go up there with them. They are anxious to know that when they return here they will have the approval of a congressional committee. I regret that this resolution has caused such a controversy, particularly when it affects New York State, that has poured out millions of dollars very liberally, and now when it asks for a few paltry hundred dollars to take care of the most devastating situation in the history of the southern tier of New York there is objection.

Mr. WARREN. Of course, the gentleman from New York knows that I am not talking about that phase of the matter. I am talking about the precedent we will establish here in the House. I have a certain responsibility for the time being as Chairman of the Committee on Accounts. This means there will be literally hundreds of similar resolutions introduced. Therefore, if this is going to cost one penny, then I object.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. I understand two minority Members are provided for in the resolution, or it is suggested that they be included. The understanding I have is that the gentleman from New York, Mr. LLOYD, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. COLE, will be suggested. I further understand from them that they are prepared to pay their own expenses up there and do not expect reimbursement.

Mr. O'CONNOR. May I make this suggestion in that connection? Let this resolution pass and then we can take care of the matter of accounts when it comes up later. In my opinion the suggestion just made by the gentleman from New York will be followed by these other Members, who will pay their own expenses.

Mr. WARREN. If the gentleman will state he does not expect the appropiration of one cent for this trip, then, of course, I withdraw my objection; otherwise, I shall object.

Mr. BEITER. As far as I am personally concerned, I will pay my own expenses, and I hope this will serve as a precedent for the other Members.

Mr. WARREN. And the gentleman will withdraw his companion resolution?

Mr. BEITER. I will withdraw my companion resolution.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman take that position on other propositions that come up from time to time from various parts of the country? There have been some investigations previously made that are just as foolish as the gentleman thinks this is, and I notice he has always brought in an appropriation with which to pay the expenses. If he is going right straight through with it, I have no objection. If he makes the objection to this resolution, I want him to object in the future.

Mr. WARREN. I have brought in appropriations after the House had acted and commanded me to bring them in, as the gentleman from New York well knows. I do not care whether it is in my district or anywhere else, I am going to oppose establishing a precedent like this, and shall object to every one, no matter what section of the country it comes from. The gentleman already knew that was my position, and he did not have to even ask it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. COLE of New York. I think it should be definitely understood that this investigation will not in any way impair or interfere with the activities of Federal agencies now in force up there, because they are doing a splendid job. We do not want them to hesitate in their efforts by waiting to see what this investigating committee will do. May I say for myself that if I serve on this committee I should be happy to do so without compensation.

What we really need up there is action and not investigation. There are hundreds and hundreds of miles of town roads and bridges that are washed out. The farmers are unable to get their crops to the market. Milk is being poured upon the ground.

This afternoon I have introduced a measure appropriating $7,500,000 for the reconstruction of town and county roads and bridges and dikes in this community. If you really want to do something worth while you will see that this appropriation is given immediate attention and favorable action.

Mr. LORD. Mr. Speaker, with respect to the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COLE], who has just spoken with regard to expenses, I may say that I do not want any expenses for going up in the district.

Mr. GOODWIN. Mr. Speaker, I simply want to register the fact, without going into detail, that the same flood conditions exist in the Twenty-seventh Congressional District. This district is closely connected with the districts of the gentlemen from New York, Mr. COLE and Mr. LORD, and may I ask if the resolution will cover investigating conditions in the Twenty-seventh District through the county superintendents of highways?

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I should like to have the language of the resolution broad enough to cover that portion of the Forty-third District of New York which has been affected by the floods.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas there exists in the State of New York a condition which is likely to result in a serious epidemic and health menace to thousands of its citizens, caused by floods and torrential rains; and

Whereas flood waters from Cayuga and Seneca Lakes, and the Chenango, Susquehanna, Chemung, and Cannestea Rivers have caused extensive property damage in middle central New York; and

Whereas roads have been destroyed, bridges washed out, dams carried away, and homes razed in this flood-ravaged district; and

Whereas the flood damage is largely due to lack of river improvement and flood control along said rivers and lakes; and

Whereas it is essential in the preparation of any permanent river improvement and flood-control program that a proper plan be perfected with the aid and cooperation of the United States Board of Army Engineers and other agencies of the Federal Government: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to appoint a committee of six Members of the House, including the Chairmen of the Rivers and Harbors and the Flood Control Committees, and two additional members of each of the above-named committees, who are authorized and directed, when appointed, to make an investigation of the conditions existing in said middle central New York.

For the purpose of this resolution the committee is hereby authorized to have sittings and hearings in regard to said matter at such time and place as it deems proper and necessary, in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, and/or at such place or places in the State of New York as said committee may deem advisable to a full and complete investigation of conditions existing in and about said rivers and lakes.

Mr. TURPIN. Mr. Speaker, as the author of the resolution knows, the Susquehanna River rises in New York and, of course, the farther it goes, the greater becomes the volume. All the waters from the Susquehanna in New York go down through our district, augmented by several tributaries feeding the stream below the New York State line and in one little valley alone our farmers have lost over $600,000 in crops. The total property damage was great, with loss of several lives.

I know the Army Engineers and the special committee, if they do any investigating at all, will want to investigate conditions along the entire length of the river and not simply one small section.

The author of the resolution has very willingly agreed we should add the words "and Pennsylvania" after the words "New York", and I offer an amendment to that effect.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TURPIN: Page 2, line 8, after the words "New York", insert "and Pennsylvania", and in line 14, after the words "New York", insert "and Pennsylvania."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BEITER: Page 1, in the second "Whereas", after the word "Cayuga", insert "Keuka", and after the word "Chemung" strike out the word "and", and after the word "Rivers" insert "and their tributaries."

On page 2, line 3, after the word "a", insert the word "special", and strike out all of line 4 and the words "Control Committees, and".

In line 5, after the word "two", strike out the word "additional", and at the end of the line strike out the word "of", and in line 6, strike out the word "above named" and insert "Rivers and Harbors and Flood Control."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The Chair appointed the following committee: Mr. WILSON of Louisiana, Mr. GAVAGAN, Mr. WHITTINGTON, Mr. BEITER, Mr. LORD, and Mr. COLE of New York.

CENTRAL STATISTICAL COMMITTEE

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Acting Chairman and by direction of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 7590) to create a Central Statistical Committee and a Central Statistical Board, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, and concur in the Senate amendments. This course is agreeable to the members of the committee and to Members with whom I have conferred on the other side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 7590, with Senate amendments thereto, and concur in the Senate amendments. The Clerk will report the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 10, after "Committee", insert "and to the President for transmittal to Congress."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object, though I shall not object. I think it is a fine thing that we can adjourn over until Monday, but I hope in the future we will be able to arrange our business so that we will not have to eliminate the business in order on Calendar Wednesday. I have just about come to the conclusion that if we should adjourn before Christmas and should continue to eliminate Calendar Wednesday, a number of committees will not be reached during this session of Congress. The committee of which I am chairman has a number of bills that we would like to have considered during this session of Congress. There are committees ahead of it, and I hope that our committee will be reached before Congress adjourns.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the majority leader what the program is going to be with regard to the Private Calendar?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That will come up the week after next.

Mr. BIERMANN. Is there not going to be some special arrangement to have the Private Calendar called on some special day?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I think we will be able to handle all of the bills on the Private Calendar, but I cannot say definitely. It will be subject to the will of the House whether we take it up out of order.

Mr. BIERMANN. Does the majority leader expect to ask unanimous consent to that effect? There are something like 400 bills on the Private Calendar, and we have passed over on three separate times the omnibus bills. We have had only one-half day on the omnibus bills. Those are small bills comparatively, but they are of great importance to the people involved. Instead of adjourning over week ends right along we ought to have the Private Calendar considered.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Let me say to the gentleman that I believe every effort will be made to take care of the Private Calendar before we adjourn. Personally, I will do all I can.

Mr. BIERMANN. Including the omnibus bills?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Including the omnibus bills; and if necessary, by some special arrangement.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR]?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. SHANLEY (at the request of Mr. SMITH of Connecticut), for 3 days, on account of important business.

THE SPEAKER'S BIRTHDAY

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 7 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, the speech I shall deliver today would have been delivered day after tomorrow, if the House were to be in session then.

Associated with these ancient halls of legislation are some customs that are perfectly eloquent in sentiment and beauty, and among the best and finest of these is the time-honored tradition which on special occasions prompts us to pause in our busy routine and pay our tributes of respect and homage to someone whom we all love and who has served the House and the Nation faithfully and well.

As an observer since the beginning of the century from yonder press gallery and from the floor, I have witnessed many such occasions in this House when worth was recognized and genius was extolled, and always I have felt the thrill of inspiration as I witnessed the House, by a singular transformation, pass instantaneously from the turbulence of acrimonious and stormy debate into an atmosphere of beautiful concord, when members of all political parties, with politics adjourned, would vie with each other in expressing appreciation of one of their fellows and in placing their garlands at his feet. Nothing the House, with its innumerable variations of moods and expressions, does is more human and at the same time more godlike than this. These overflows of good-fellowship drown all that is base and dross in our natures, while they freshen and vitalize the springs of friendship.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is meet and proper that we should tarry a little while today to pay our respects to a Member from Tennessee who on day after tomorrow will pass another milestone in his very useful life. This Member is distinctly one of us, though he sits in majesty over us. He would modestly claim to be one of the least of us, though we all know he is one of the greatest of the many illustrious men who have served with dignity and distinction in the office second in importance in the American Nation—the Speakership of the House of Representatives.

There is one word in the English language that best describes this man in his relationship with the Membership of this House It is a fine old word that connotes frendship, loyalty, truth, and sincerity. It is the word "comrade." The Speaker is a comrade of all of us. Often when we contemplate the power and awe of the Speakership and the position which the office occupies in the annals of history we are prone to think of a Speaker as a person who is austere, brusque, and repellant; but however truly that description may have fit some of the Speakers of the yesteryear, it does not apply to the present occupant of the Chair. His manner is kindliness personified. His passion for service shines so radiantly that all who need his counsel know that to seek it is to find it. Every Member of this House may go to him with an individual problem at any time with the certainty of sympathetic counsel. The portals of his heart are open always to the members of the minority, as well as to those of his own party faith. To him, "A man's a man for a' that", be he a Republican or a Democrat, a Progressive, a Non-Partisan, or a Farmer-Laborite. While he is a militant fighter for his party, he is a stanch defender of the rights of the minorities. By his lovable personality he grips us to him with hoops of steel. To know him is to love him. Such a man is our Speaker. He is one of America's biggest assets. From the opening day of the Seventy-fourth Congress he has filled the office with dignity and ability befitting a great man and a great office. Like Jefferson and Jackson and Lincoln, he is singularly blessed with the human touch and his heart keeps rhythm with the heartbeats of 125,000,000 people. In him the elements are so well mixed that Nature might stand up and say to all the world, "This is a man."

Day after tomorrow, ladies and gentlemen of the House, will be the sixty-sixth birthday anniversary of one of America's greatest statesmen, our friend and comrade, JOSEPH W. BYRNS. I know that I express what is in the hearts of all of us and that I voice the sentiment of the Nation he serves so devotedly and so well when I extend congratulations and wish for him many more years of health and happiness. [Applause, the Members rising.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Speaker may proceed for 40 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is distinctly out of order. [Laughter.]

SENATE BILL REFERRED

A bill of the Senate of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and, under the rule, referred as follows:

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

OATHS OF CUSTOMS AND INTERNAL-REVENUE EMPLOYEES—WATCH SMUGGLING BILL

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask permission to introduce two bills for appropriate reference, and also ask leave that statements explaining the bills may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bills will be received and appropriately referred and the accompanying statements, presented by the Senator from Massachusetts, will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 3286) to abolish the oath required of customs and internal-revenue employees prior to the receipt of compensation, and for other purposes (with an accompanying paper), was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The statement presented by Mr. WALSH to accompany Senate bill 3286 is as follows:

The bill is designed—

1. To repeal certain sections of existing law requiring oaths from customs and internal-revenue employees (that they have not received any gratuity for any acts performed in connection with the performance of their duties) before they may receive compensation.

2. To amend section 516 (b) of the Tariff Act of 1930, which relates to protests by domestic manufacturers, producers, or wholesalers against the classification or rate of duty imposed on imported merchandise of the same character as that manufactured, produced, or sold by them. Under the existing law the liquidation of entries of merchandise, the classification or duty rate of which has been protested, is suspended pending the decision of the United States Customs Court. The present proposed amendment is designed to remove the period of uncertainty under existing law, during which importers do not know what duties they may be required to pay, by making the result of successful domestic protest apply only to importation subsequent to a judicial ruling sustaining the protest, and not, as at present, to importations made in some cases many months prior to such a ruling. The period of uncertainty under present law is a great hardship to responsible importers, who, unlike irresponsible importers, cannot continue importing the goods in question on the chance that the courts will uphold the lower duty rate. Since they must anticipate the possibility of an adverse decision, this results in a virtual embargo on importations by them pending disposition of the protestant's case. Less responsible importers, on the other hand, continue their importations of such merchandise, gambling on the probability that the courts will sustain the lower duty rate so that they will not have to make provisions for an adverse decision, and knowing well that if they are ever called upon to pay the additional duty they will not be able to do so. In some instances worthless corporations are organized to take advantage of this situation.

3. To amend section 641 of the Tariff Act of 1930 (which relates to the issuance, suspension, and revocation of licenses as customhouse brokers) so as to make the procedure of revoking or suspending customhouse broker licenses conform with the procedure of suspending or disbarring agents, attorneys, or other persons representing claimants before the Treasury Department, as set out in the act of July 7, 1884 (23 Stat. 236 at 258, 259).

The bill (S. 3287) to provide for the licensing of importers of watches, watch movements, and watch parts, to protect the revenue, and for other purposes (with an accompanying paper), was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The statement presented by Mr. WALSH, to accompany Senate bill 3287, is as follows:

EXPLANATION OF THE WATCH SMUGGLING BILL

Section 1, the definition section, defines the terms "person", "license", "licensee", "watches, watch movements, and watch parts", and "United States" for the purposes of the act.

The only provision of this section of more than formal importance is subsection (c), which defines "watches, watch movements, and watch parts" to mean watches, watch movements, and watch parts as described in the watch duty provisions of the Tariff Act of 1930, subsections (a) and (c) of paragraph 367 of schedule 3. This is done because of the difficulty which would arise if a less specific definition were employed as to what constitutes a watch and what a clock. It is not desired to include clocks in this act since there is no organized smuggling traffic in them. Subsection (c) also contains a proviso exempting from inclusion in the term, watches which are admitted free of duty into the United States under any provision of the free list. This will have principal application to paragraph 1798 of schedule 16 of the Tariff Act of 1930, which grants $100 duty exemption on personal effects of persons coming from abroad. It is not thought desirable, however, to extend this exemption to watch movements and watch parts, since it is feared that if it were so extended an organized racket in connection with the nominally noncommercial importation of such merchandise might grow up.

Section 2 (a) provides that after 90 days after the enactment of the bill no person shall import watches, watch movements, or watch parts unless he is either licensed for that purpose by the Secretary of the Treasury or has been granted a special permit by a collector of customs, subject to conditions to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury. The licensing provision will cover regular importers and the special permit is designed to cover noncommercial importations which are not on the free list, but which are not of the character intended to be covered by this act. An example of this would be an instance where a returning traveler brought two or three fine watches of several hundred dollars' value into the United States. Under paragraph 1798 he would only have a $100 exemption and would have to pay duty on the excess, but there would be no logical reason why he should have to comply with the licensing and marking provision of this act. Each licensee shall pay for his license the amount deemed necessary by the Secretary of the Treasury to cover the administrative cost of issuing the license, but not more than $100. Watches, watch movements, and watch parts must be entered at ports of entry designated by the Secretary, as in the case of antique furniture under section 489 of the Tariff Act of 1930. The Secretary is required to furnish current lists of licensees, together with the mark or symbol awarded each licensee, to collectors at these designated ports.

Section 2 (b) provides that a license is not transferable and is good for 1 year unless the Secretary suspends or revokes it prior to that time.

Section 3 prescribes qualifications for obtaining and holding licenses. No license is to be issued to any person who has been convicted of, or is under indictment for, violation of the customs laws, or who fails to comply with the provisions of this act or regulations issued under this act, or who fails to file the voluntary inventory provided for by section 7 of this act. This inventory, which will be explained in more detail below, is to cover imported watches, etc., already in this country when this act goes into effect. The Secretary may suspend or revoke licenses of licensees failing to comply with the act, and shall suspend the license of a licensee under indictment for violation of the customs laws, and revoke the same after conviction for such an offense. It is made unlawful for persons prohibited from obtaining or holding a license to employ or to be employed by a licensee. This provision is directed against the set-up of a straw man by persons who, by reason of their unlawful activities, are unable to get licenses.

Section 4 provides that after the effective date of the act (90 days after enactment) all watches and watch movements having more than one jewel, or having one jewel and one or more bouchons or bushings, and all separately imported pillar plates and top bridges, which are imported into this country must, in addition to the markings at present required by law, be marked with a distinguishing mark or symbol in the country of manufacture, unless admitted under the special permit authorized by section 2 (a). The Secretary of the Treasury is to designate separate symbols for each licensee. Since the purpose of the present bill is to provide an effective check on watch smuggling with a minimum interference with legitimate commerce, it is not felt desirable to subject unjeweled or single-jeweled watches to these marking provisions. Watches with one jewel or with none are treated alike for duty purposes under the Tariff Act of 1930, and as they are of slight value there is no organized smuggling traffic in them. The importance of the reference to watches and movements having bouchons or bushings is derived from the fact that our courts have held that these metal parts inserted in lieu of jewels are not technically jewels or substitutes for jewels within the meaning of the tariff act, and hence, if a watch with one jewel and a number of bouchons or bushings (the terms being use synonymously) were brought in, the duty would be paid only at the rate prescribed for single-jeweled watches. In view of these facts, the common practice, therefore, is to bring in watches with one jewel and a number of bouchons (the duty rate on single-jeweled watches is the same as nonjeweled watches) and after entry and payment of duty, punch out the bouchons and replace them with jewels. To permit watches of this character, the jeweling of which is stepped up after they reach this country, to go unmarked, would provide a convenient avenue for smuggling, since smugglers, in that event, could claim that all unmarked watches found in their possession had been jeweled after they arrived in this country and, therefore, were not required to be marked. The importance of extending the marking provisions to pillar plates and top bridges, if imported separately, comes from the fact that it is on these parts that the mark or symbol prescribed by this act will have to be placed, and if they were permitted to be imported separately without marks they could be assembled in this country, and the watches of which they became a part would contain no mark or symbol by which they could be traced or subjected to the supervisory features of this act.

Section 5 is modeled along the lines of section 511 of the Tariff Act of 1930. It is designed to permit inspection at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury or a collector of customs of the stock, books, records, etc., of persons importing or dealing in imported watches, etc., or purchasing them at governmental sales. Appropriate penalties are provided for failure to permit inspection.

Section 6 subjects to forfeiture watches imported in violation of this act.

Section 7 provides for a voluntary inventory of imported watches already in this country when the act goes into effect. Under this section any importer, wholesaler, or retailer of watches, etc., may, within 150 days after enactment of this act, voluntarily file with the collector of customs of the district in which he is doing business, an inventory of all imported watches, movements, and parts subject to the marking provisions of this act, which were imported into the United States prior to the effective date of the act (90 days after enactment). If any such watch, etc., is not marked pursuant to section 4 of this act, and if, with respect to such watch, etc., no voluntary inventory is filed under this section, this will raise a prima facie presumption in any proceeding looking to the forfeiture of such watch, etc., that it was unlawfully imported into the United States. The burden will then be on the claimant to rebut this presumption. It is believed that this presumption will be very helpful to the Government in sustaining its case in watch forfeiture proceedings.

Section 8 authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to make necessary regulations.

Section 9 is the separability clause.

Section 10 gives a short title to the act "The Watch Smuggling Act."

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 348) authorizing exchange of coins and currencies and immediate payment of gold-clause securities by the United States, withdrawing the right to sue the United States on its bonds and other similar obligations, limiting the use of certain appropriations, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

THE WAR DEBTS—ARTICLE BY CLIFFORD L. WEBSTER

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD an article by Mr. Clifford L. Webster, of 18 Locust Avenue, Port Washington, N. Y., entitled "The War Debts Are Collectible." It is a very thoughtful article and, I think, worthy of reading.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Can the United States collect the loans it made to European nations during and immediately after the World War? Yes, it can; if it is willing to accept payment in the forms in which payment can be made. This we as a nation have steadfastly refused to do. Why should we do so anomalous a thing as to refuse payment of debts which we insist on collecting? It is because the idea of "money" has befogged our thinking on this subject, as it has on so many others. Let us draw aside this veil of money and examine the underlying realities.

As a start we will do well to note a few basic facts of international trade. There being no international money, this trade is essentially a matter of barter. One nation exchanges a portion of the commodities it produces and the services it can render for a portion of the goods and services of another nation. That this exchange is not always direct, and may involve other nations, does not materially alter the situation.

If, starting all even, one nation supplies the rest of the world with more goods and services than it receives in return, that nation must loan the other nations an amount equal to the difference. There is no other way of balancing the books. The other nations, now being in debt to the first, must henceforth supply it with a volume of goods and services equal to that they receive plus the amount of the interest on this debt, or else go further into debt. If they are to pay off the debt, their excess volume of exports must be greater still.

Gold, sometimes erroneously thought of as international money, may seem to be left out of this statement, but it is not. Despite the mysticism which has grown up about it, it is still just a yellow metal, produced from natural resources by labor, as other commodities are produced. It is traded internationally by the ounce and not as coin. As it is generally held as nonconsumable goods, it may be shipped back and forth a number of times in settling minor trade balances, but the net amount shipped in any period is properly included with other goods in figuring the international balance.

We see, then, that a nation can become a creditor only by exporting more than it imports. It follows that it can receive payment of the principal and interest of its loans only by taking back more goods and services than it continues to supply. This the United States has consistently refused to do since it became a creditor nation. So, of necessity, foreign indebtedness to us has continued to pile up.

The war debts arose because for 3½ years following our entrance into the World War we furnished European nations with a large volume of goods produced in this country. Priced in the dollar of that time the goods and services we supplied exceeded those we received by about $10,000,000,000. To cover this amount the various foreign governments gave the United States Treasury their notes. The Treasury in turn paid the American producers of these goods with American money raised by the sale of Liberty bonds.

It is important to remember that the Treasury loaned the foreign governments credit, not money, and that what we sent to Europe was not gold or American dollars, but steel and copper, cotton and wheat, food and clothing, guns and munitions. Had we sent gold and currency across the Atlantic, we could expect to receive dollars or gold in return. But what we actually supplied was goods and the service of transporting them. If we are ever to get payment, we must take it in similar form; that is, goods and services, although, of course, these need not be of an identical nature.

So far the only form of excess goods we have been willing to receive has been gold, but the amount of this metal in the world is quite inadequate for the purpose. We now have more than our share of it, and to take a great deal more would disrupt the already shaky financial structure of the world. Between 1920 and 1931 we received a net amount of a billion and a half dollars' worth of gold. During the same period our "favorable" trade balance on all other goods and services was $2,000,000,000. So we had to take notes for half a billion more, besides reloaning the $7,000,000,000 that came due as interest or principal payments. It is then quite obvious that as a nation we received no repayment, and that whatever the Treasury received on account eventually came out of the pockets of American investors in foreign securities.

The reason we have refused to accept payment in kind may be summed up in the phrase "economic nationalism." We have felt that to take more than we gave would injure our agriculture, industry, and merchant marine, would cause unemployment, and weaken our national defense. Although I do not approve this policy, believing it largely responsible for the world-wide depression, I fear it is likely to persist for some time.

How, then, are we to collect the war debts if payment can only be made in goods and services and we are unwilling to accept such an excess of these in the usual course of trade? We can do it by finding acceptable goods and services outside this usual international commerce, things which can be supplied direct to the American people without the intervention of "business", and which will not interfere with our own industrial system. I can suggest three such extra services. They are public works, free travel, and foreign scholarships.

Before taking these up in detail let us consider that well-known phrase "capacity to pay." If in 3½ years, while we were putting out a tremendous war effort of our own, we were able to supply Europe with an excess of goods amounting to $10,000,000,000, is it not absurd to say that Europe, with its millions of unemployed, its many idle factories, its empty hotels, and its rusting steamships, cannot supply us with an equal excess of goods or services in 50 years, 20 years, or even 10 years? The answer is that Europe can make practically unlimited payment if we will stop talking money and let them "work it out." Such payment would have the same beneficial results to their business and employment as a program of local public works, since the money would be spent by the several governments in payments to their own citizens. If the American Government can spend over $3,000,000,000 in 2 years to get these results, surely the combined debtor governments can afford to spend a quarter billion or even a billion a year for them, and at the same time get their debts paid off.

While I believe these war debts are properly due us and should be collected, it is probable that the debtors are entitled to a readjustment of our claims. The goods they received were priced at the exceedingly high war levels. Prices have since been drastically deflated. Even with the apparently generous funding arrangements which were made, this means that we are asking some of them to pay us back a much greater volume of goods than we loaned. The whole transaction should be figured in a commodity unit of value, so that regardless of past or future changes in the price level, we should receive a quantity of goods and services equal to that we loaned. We should be willing to accept a very low interest rate. This is because the great bulk of the supplies we sent were used in fighting the war, were economically nonproductive, and so were unable to "earn their keep."

Now let us consider some of the ways in which real payments may be received. First, there are public works, to be built by foreign governments, using their own labor, engineering supervision, and materials, and feeding their laborers from their own country or from countries where they have credit balances. The American Government should furnish such land as would be needed for construction camps and should admit their supplies duty free.

The projects should, in the main, be such as we do not feel we can afford to build for ourselves at present. They could be most easily handled at our seaports, on our borders, or on foreign soil. For instance, we might have all our large cities equipped with sewage- and garbage-disposal plants. In my opinion, no people can consider itself truly civilized while it continues to pollute its rivers and harbors. Or these cities might be given huge municipal swimming pools. Ancient Rome had magnificent public baths for its citizens; could we not do likewise? Great Britain could well build our share of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway for us. While there is considerable question whether the economic advantages of this project warrant the necessary expenditure of American capital, it would be a very desirable asset if it could be obtained without any appreciable new outlays by the Treasury. Should it be thought desirable to supplement the Panama Canal by one through Nicaragua, for which we have already acquired the right-of-way, it could be built entirely by the debtor nations without any further cost to us. You can readily think of many other projects, for there are an infinite number of ways in which public works can make this a better world to live in. No matter how much we let foreign nations do for us, there will always be plenty left for us to do ourselves.

Let me make it very clear that these foreign-built projects would be in addition to our own public-works program, would not curtail it in the least, and so would deprive no American workman of a job. In fact, when completed and put in operation, they would create a number of new jobs. It should also be clear that while we might be able to build such works cheaper ourselves, we can much better afford to credit our debtors with 20 or 30 percent extra than to spend our own money, meanwhile forcing cancelation or default of the debts. If thought desirable, some of these projects could be put on a partially "self-liquidating" basis, thus bringing the Treasury some revenue.

A second extra service, and one which greatly appeals to me, is free foreign travel for American citizens. I believe, as a matter of justice, this should be distributed among the income-tax payers as a sort of refund, for they are the ones who will have to supply the money to retire the Liberty bonds which financed the loans. Of course, the Government collects many taxes besides those on income, but the income-tax payers contribute their full share of these also.

In 1932 there were about a million and a half income-tax payers, but judging by the past, this number should treble, due to the lowering of exemptions and the return of a reasonable degree of prosperity. Under present funding arrangements we are supposed to receive about $255,000,000 annually on the war-debt account. If We place the unit of distribution at $340, which will pay for a minimum rate, all-expense, 30-day trip to Europe, or give 2 people a very nice 2 weeks' vacation in Canada, Bermuda, or the Bahamas, we could care for three-quarters of a million taxpayers a year. Each could be assured of a free cruise about once in 6 years. Or more luxurious cruises could be distributed at longer intervals.

Under this plan the debtor governments would make their payments to the United States Treasury in the form of credits, to be used for travel accommodations in their own countries or on their own steamships. The foreign governments would, of course, reimburse the private owners of steamships, hotels, and other facilities for the services each rendered in carrying out this plan. The Treasury would then distribute three-quarters of a million free travel certificates to the income-tax payers. They, in turn, could transform these into such travel accommodations as they wished at travel agencies.

That this should be as largely as possible an extra service, these certificates should be nontransferable, except within the immediate family of the recipient. If he, or the Treasury, were allowed to sell them, they would simply go back into the usual balance of trade, and so defeat any real payment. Even so, some of them would go to those who would have traveled abroad anyway. But this would be partly offset by the fact that many tourists would use these certificates in addition to, rather than instead of, the dollars they would usually spend on travel, and should be more than made up by the foreign spending of the great number who could not otherwise have gone abroad.

As a method of distribution, I would suggest that as income-tax returns are filed the names of all those who pay a tax be listed alphabetically, that letters then be drawn, and the number of names included under each letter drawn be subtracted from the number of certificates available, until these are exhausted. The recipient of a certificate would not be entitled to be listed again until all income-tax payers had been cared for. However, all letters would be included in each year's drawing, in order to care for new taxpayers. In any year in which a taxpayer could not use a travel certificate his name should, upon request, be omitted from the drawing list. This system of drawing is simple. It would have the great advantage that where more than one member of a family paid income taxes, and would therefore be entitled to a certificate, such members of a family would receive their trips at the same time. To allow planning ahead certificates should be good for 15 months.

Of course, variations of this method are possible. If you think more of equity than of equality, you would divide the taxpayers into several classes by the amount they pay, and give certificates of greater value to those who pay much than to those who pay little. If you do not blink at admitting that the human race loves to gamble, you might add zest to the affair by giving every tenth person on the list a certificate of double value and every hundredth person a quadruple one. Because of its educational value, some of this travel might well be given to school teachers. As their salaries are exempt from income tax, very few of them would be on the Treasury's list.

The third method of receiving payment was put forward by John Crowe Ransom. It is that we take some 5,000 foreign scholarships a year. These would be distributed free to the high-school graduates throughout the country who would be most likely to profit from them. I think this is an excellent idea. It could be used in conjunction with either of the foregoing plans.

Perhaps you can think up other acceptable extra services. For instance, I could suggest that the debtor nations take some millions of our unemployed to feed and clothe in their own countries until we needed them again. However, I think that plan would appeal to very few; it certainly does not appeal to me.

Some selfish persons will claim that one or another of these plans would be detrimental to their business, but I believe that if any of them were carefully worked out, it would be found that the injuries to American interests would be extremely small in comparison to the benefits derived. The babbitt type of mind will label the whole idea impractical, because it calls for no cash payments. But to me it seems much more practical to take something of real value in return for these debts than to force them into default or cancelation by demanding the impossible.

The real war loans were products of American natural resources and American toil. Until we get back an equal amount of the products of foreign natural resources and foreign labor we shall have received no real payment.

THE GUFFEY COAL BILL

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article by Gen. Hugh S. Johnson, appearing in the Washington Daily News of July 18, 1935, relative to the so-called "Guffey coal bill."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ONE MAN'S OPINION

By Hugh S. Johnson

"There is every reason in economics, government, and humanity to pass the Guffey bill promptly. The argument for not passing it is a desire to preserve an unregulated zone of license."

Great pother is made about the administration urging to pass the Guffey bill, on the following arguments:

The bill is unconstitutional. To ask for its passage is to violate the oath of the urger to support and defend the Constitution, and to suborn a violation of his oath by every legislator who is urged.

To support this dictum the argument is that the Guffey bill purports to regulate mining within a State, that the Supreme Court in the "sick chicken" case decided that the Federal Government could not, under the Constitution, regulate mining within a State, and therefore that a vote for the Guffey bill is a vote to violate the Constitution.

"The Constitution is what the Supreme Court says it is"—so asserted the outstanding legal luminary of the law.

It is not what Congress says or what any legislator may think it is. If a bill was proposed to restore slavery, a man would be impeached if he voted for such a clear-cut violation.

But in the vague and cloudy air of the extent of Federal power under the commerce clause, nobody but the Supreme Court knows the answer.

The Supreme Court has never said that the Federal Government may not regulate coal mining in a State. In fact, coal mining within a State has been regulated under the commerce clause and the Supreme Court has upheld the regulation—not once but several times.

The Court in the "sick chicken" case did not decide that Congress cannot regulate the bituminous-coal industry. It only decided that it cannot regulate wages of a shochtim butcher who kills a chicken in Brooklyn for sale in that city—which is a very long way from saying that a great national natural resource industry, which is dying for want of regulation, and which no State can possibly regulate, must go on and die, to the acute distress of millions of people, because there is no power in our system—either in any State or in the United States—to protect it from suicidal abuses.

In argument in the "sick chicken" case, the court quoted language from another case in which it was said that mining was too remote from interstate commerce to bring it within the Sherman Act, and it probably was shown to be exactly that remote in the circumstances of that quoted case.

But, on the very same day that it decided the "sick chicken" case, the court warned that such language so quoted from another case does not make the law or confine its decision in a subsequent case.

The disclosures of N. R. A. prove that, unless the Federal Government can regulate these great national industries, there is no power in this country that can regulate them. The court cannot, and will not, in a case clearly presenting this outstanding fact, decide that in this Government alone, of all the governments on the globe, there exists any such vast zone of economic anarchy.

N. R. A. can't be brought up again to present that problem. The Guffey bill, if enacted and promptly brought before the court, would present it. It must be presented and presented quickly, for if we have any such insane blind spot as that in our Constitution (which is an absurd idea), then we must amend the Constitution and do it quickly.

There is every reason in economics, government, and humanity to pass the Guffey bill promptly. The argument for not passing it is the urging of those who would like to preserve exactly the unregulated zone of license which any uncertainty on this fundamental point permits.

AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ADMINISTRATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8492) to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, as I understand the parliamentary situation, the pending question is the adoption of the committee amendment to section 21 (a). Is that correct?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair decides that the parliamentary situation is this: To the committee amendment on page 61, beginning in line 15, the Chair understands the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] has offered an amendment in the nature of a substitute, and that is the pending amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What has become of the committee amendment to section 21 (a)? That is the question I am discussing.

Mr. GEORGE. It was passed over temporarily.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The parliamentary clerk advises the Chair that that amendment was passed over.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask to have it taken up now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Georgia to the committee amendment on page 61, line 15, is now pending. The amendment to which the Senator from Alabama refers can only be taken up at this time by unanimous consent.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think what I have suggested would be the orderly way in which to proceed, because if section 21 (a), the committee amendment, should be eliminated, then there would be no controversy about the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is not sufficiently familiar with the legislation to know what it is best to do. He will put the request for unanimous consent if the Senator from Alabama so desires.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Alabama that the only purpose in the world in offering this particular amendment to subsection (d) on page 61 was that in the event of its adoption it would simply prevent duplication, because it is desired by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], who has suggested an amendment, that substantially the same provision be inserted in section 21 (a), on page 58, and we were simply endeavoring to prevent a duplication of language.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I understand the purpose of the Senator, but I submit to him the orderly way would be to consider first section 21 (a). If that committee amendment shall be adopted, there will be no necessity for the compromise amendment; if it shall not be adopted, I will favor the compromise amendment. So the real test is on the adoption first of the amendment as to foreclosure from the courts.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield; but we are dealing with a parliamentary question now, and I hope this discussion will not be taken out of my time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is yielding.

Mr. NORRIS. I will not ask the Senator to yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask unanimous consent that section 21 (a) be now considered.

Mr. GEORGE. I shall have to object to that, because, in the interest of preventing a duplication, the bill should be dealt with in the way in which we are now proceeding.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The real test involved is whether the committee amendment contained on pages 57, 58, and part of page 59 shall be eliminated from the bill or retained. If that amendment should be retained, then, of course, there would be no occasion for the compromise amendment, because no suits could be brought on account of transactions which took place under the present act. If that committee amendment should not be retained, then I quite agree that the compromise amendment should be adopted, because it would apply then to past transactions the same rule that it is proposed to apply to future transactions under the bill.

Mr. President, how much time have I?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time will expire at 12:30 o'clock.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am addressing myself now to the proposition which I have just stated and to the importance of retaining section 21 (a) in the bill. That is the provision which would foreclose suits for the recovery of taxes under the existing law.

I desire to point out to Members of the Senate in the beginning that in a few days we are going to have this very same question before the Senate in another bill. Yesterday the House passed the bill known as the "gold-bond bill." Doubtless it will be before the Senate in a few days. That bill adopts the same policy that is contained in the committee amendment to the pending bill, namely, to foreclose the bringing of suits in the courts as the result of the act of Congress in devaluating the gold dollar. It involves the same questions that claimants are injecting here, namely, that they have a right to show they have been damaged by that action. It is proposed by that bill—and I am in favor of the bill—to do exactly the same thing we are proposing to do in this bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator as to being in favor of the other bill, but I do not agree with him when he says that it is proposing to do just the same thing as we are now trying to do here.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I say the same principle is involved.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not like to take the Senator's time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I say the same principle is involved, foreclosing the courts to that kind of claim.

This is not a new proposition. There is a precedent power for it in legislation and in a decision by the Supreme Court of the United States in what we call the Philippine tariff case. Following the war with Spain the President levied tariffs for the Philippines after we obtained possession of the islands. Later, after the ratification of the peace treaty, those tariffs were continued. The Supreme Court held that before the ratification of the treaty the President had the power, as the commander in chief of the colony, to levy the tax, but after the ratification of peace he did not have that power. The tariffs, however, were continued and payments were made under the order of the President. Suit was brought in a case known as United States v. Heinszen & Co. (206 U. S. —). After the decision of the Supreme Court that the tariff collections were illegal after the ratification of the treaty, Congress then passed an act providing as follows:

That the tariff duties, both import and export, imposed by the authorities of the United States or of the provisional military government thereof in the Philippine Islands prior to March 8, 1902, at all ports and places in said islands, upon all goods, wares, and merchandise imported into said islands from the United States, or from foreign countries, or exported from said islands, are hereby legalized and ratified, and the collection of all such duties prior to March 8, 1902, is hereby legalized and ratified and confirmed as fully to all intents and purposes as if the same had by prior act of Congress been specifically authorized and directed.

My time is so limited that I shall not have time to read the portions of the opinion which I should like to present to the Senate, but the Court held:

That where an agent, without precedent authority, has exercised in the name of a principal a power which the principal had the capacity to bestow, the principal may ratify and affirm the unauthorized act, and thus retroactively give it validity when rights of third persons have not intervened, is so elementary as to need but statement. That the power of ratification as to matters within their authority may be exercised by Congress, State governments, or municipal corporations is also elementary.

Then the Court proceeded to a discussion in which it pointed out and held that, although there was no authority for collection of the taxes sued for, yet by the act of ratification the taxpayer was foreclosed from sustaining a suit for a refund of taxes.

I submit that the question has not only received the attention of the Congress of the United States for the avowed purpose of cutting off and foreclosing recovery of taxes which might have been authorized by Congress, but which had not been legally authorized in a constitutional way, but the Congress then fully ratified and confirmed the levy and collection of the taxes in an irregular and unauthorized way under color of authority and by an order of the President which he had no power to execute. The Supreme Court fully sustained it.

There we have the precedent, both by Congress and by the highest court of our country, for foreclosing suits of this character upon claims which have grown out of the collection of taxes under color of authority in cases where the Congress did have the power, but had not properly executed it.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I cannot yield. I have only a few minutes. Please permit me to finish my legal argument.

Mr. President, why be so technical in preserving the rights of the processors who are involved in this program? If the taxes have been passed on, I hear of no effort to protect the rights of the consumers who have paid the illegal taxes. If the taxes have been taken from the producers and there is a sacred right to have a refund of such taxes, I hear of no efforts to protect the producers in the recovery of taxes which have been illegally taken from them when the tax was deducted from the sale price.

If we are ratifying, as we are, the collection of the taxes levied by an agent of Congress, then I ask why we should strain at a legalistic view, why we should go so far as we are probably about to go to give a right of action to refund taxes to those who have voluntarily paid them?

There are, of course, many difficulties involved in this program. Here confessedly, I submit, under the authority of the Supreme Court in the case I have cited, there is no cause of action on the part of the processors who have paid this tax. Then why not meet the issue squarely? Why not, in ratifying the action of our agent, close up the whole question, and not leave it to the judgment and views of different district court Federal judges throughout the country?

We have a section in the code which expressly prohibits injunctions on the collection of taxes; yet, notwithstanding that express prohibition in the law, Federal judges all over the country are ignoring and violating it and issuing injunctions day after day on flimsy excuses or justification for ignoring that law. In Pennsylvania, day before yesterday, a Federal judge with a series of these injunction applications before him, in order to avoid this section, issued a declaratory judgment in each of 16 cases and notified the collector that if he attempted to collect the tax he would not give him a certificate of probable cause, and therefore he would be personally responsible for his action.

So that is the situation with which we are dealing here. If we are going to ratify this matter, let us close it up. Let us not leave it to the uncertainty involved in the determination of who passed on the tax or who took it out of the producer, a subject most difficult of ascertainment, and one on which different judges—and this is a question for the judges and not for the jury—would establish different formulas for reaching conclusions.

A processor comes in and says, "I did not pass on this tax." How is that positive statement in testimony to be overcome? Can the fact be ascertained by whether or not he has made a profit in his business? Are we going to establish the doctrine that the man who is inefficient in his business operations—inefficient as a result of obsolete machinery, bad management, inefficient sales management, and so forth—simply because he does not show a profit in his sales, because he does not show a sales price in excess of his other costs, not including this tax, is entitled to have this tax returned? Are we going into what is a reasonable cost, what salaries are paid to officials, what improper management exists all through the operations of the business; or are we going to establish whether or not various processors got the same price for their goods? If they did, of course, it would be conclusive evidence that they did pass on the tax, or else that none passed it on, unless the loss which is claimed to be absorbed is a result of inefficiency in operation.

So I submit that under this program we are simply going to open the courts to all sorts of claims all over the country, to be submitted to all sorts of judges all over the country. If we had the power—and I think few, if any, in this Chamber doubt it—to levy this excise tax; if we vested that power in an agent; if we executed a power of attorney to the Secretary of Agriculture, but the execution was faulty, the acknowledgment may not have been correct, some strict requirements of the law with reference to the terms and provisions of that power of attorney may not have met the legal requirements, why should we not ratify and confirm what was done?

That is what our situation is here. We did execute that power of attorney to our agent. We had the right to levy this tax ourselves. If we had done it either directly or, under proper standards, under a proper power of attorney, there would be no cause of action here. If we are going to ratify, as we are proposing to do in this bill, the acts of our agent, I submit to the Senate that no injustice will be done anyone, no harm will be done any taxpayer, by simply wiping out the whole transaction, and then looking to the future under the new bill which we have pending here.

If we ourselves had levied the tax there would be no claim of any kind; there would be no cause of action by those who have been operating under it, and who absorbed all or part of the tax. The only contention here is that some did absorb it. If we had prescribed in the law the exact amount of the tax, they would have absorbed it just the same, without any right of action. Simply because we levied the tax through an agent, in an indirect way, it is now claimed here that there is merit in making a distinction between an irregular and imperfect levy and one which we could have made regular and perfect.

I submit that such a distinction is technical, is without merit, and that we are about to vote a contingent liability against the Treasury of the United States of nearly a billion dollars already collected, and five or six or seven hundred million dollars to which the Government is committed for next year.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Alabama has expired.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I am much astonished that my very good friend the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] should be so exercised about this matter. If his sympathies were exercised on the other side of the question I might be able to understand it. He concludes his argument with the admonition that we are about to involve the Treasury in a liability of a billion dollars already paid, and yet we have been constantly reminded that all processing taxes have been passed on to the consumer; and under the amendment which is offered by way of substitute and solely for the purpose of preventing duplication in language, no taxpayer who has passed on the tax can recover a dime from the Treasury of the United States.

The Senator also—and that seems to have been the burden of some other speeches made—is greatly disturbed because the processors are likely to come in and have a recovery of taxes paid. I am wondering whether he would be willing to apply the same logic to the farmers who have directly and expressly absorbed the processing tax on all the hogs they have sold and on other commodities.

In virtually every case where hogs were sold in my State since the passage of the A. A. A. Act the market price was reduced by exactly the amount of the tax. I have sold hogs myself, and in every instance but one I have had to take the market price less the processing tax. I have done that repeatedly, and everyone else who sells hogs must do the same thing; so the producer, not the processor, has absorbed the tax, and not even the ultimate consumer has absorbed it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. GEORGE. I shall be glad to yield, but the Senator knows I am under limitation of time.

Mr. BARKLEY. Under the language which has been agreed upon, or under the language before there was any change, the farmer who absorbed the tax has no right to sue the Government, because he has not actually paid it into the Treasury, has he?

Mr. GEORGE. I understand; that possibly may be true, because I am going to say frankly to the Senator that this amendment does not altogether suit me. I should rather stand squarely and say to the Government, "If you wish to impose a tax that you have no authority to impose, and make some of our citizens pay it, while others of them are escaping it, you will have to take the consequences." That, however, is not the view of the Senate; so this amendment does not permit anyone who has not paid the tax to recover it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the Senator mean by that statement to imply that he would be in favor of permitting the taxpayer to recover the processing tax even though he had passed it on?

Mr. GEQRGE. In the long run it would be better for the Government to do it rather than to deny the citizen a right to go into the courts. In the long run we should have more careful legislation. In the long run we should have juster and fairer laws, and I am not prepared to say that in the long run it would not be better simply to face the issue as it is; and, for myself, I regret that a Democratic administration has even advanced this proposal.

Mr. President, we allow the man who distills liquor and the man who sells liquor to go into court and say, "I do not owe this tax", and we give him his day in court. We give every income-tax payer in this Nation his day in court. So far as I know, we have never imposed a tax upon the American cititzen without giving him his day in court.

The very men who on July 4, 1776, issued a famous declaration complained of taxation without representation and the closing of the courts to the citizens of these free States, and we are asked to do that against which they were protesting.

I would not open the Government to every possible cause of action. I would not say that any court—and certainly not all courts—should have jurisdiction of all claims arising in contract or sounding in tort, and so forth. Certainly we would stop the orderly processes of government if we did that. But when the Government runs its hand down into the pocket of an American taxpayer and then says to him, "You cannot have your day in court", it is dishonest; it is not only dishonest but it is undemocratic; and I will go further and say no free government can last if once that policy has been adopted.

I can understand why the Government does not want suits against it, and I can understand why it is necessary to say frequently, whether it altogether accords with our theory of government, that the Government can do no wrong, or at least that it does not consent to be sued; but when it comes to taking the money of the citizen out of his pocket under an invalid tax act, then I do not understand how anyone, Democrat or Republican, can defend it.

Search the tax acts from beginning to end and it will be found that the most miserable barroom dealer in this Nation, under all of the revenue acts, has his right to a day in court. Yet we are asked to say now that our manufacturers and our farmers who have absorbed this tax, or who have paid it—because many farmers have sold their own products—shall have no rights whatever.

I do not deny the power of the Government to say that it will not be sued even for the recovery of taxes, but I do deny that any government can remain a free government which denies that right to its citizens. It is more than a fiction to say that the power to tax is the power to destroy. It is the power to destroy men; it is the power to destroy property; it is the power to destroy human liberty.

Then, when we are exercising that extraordinary power, the power to destroy the citizen, to run the hand of the tax gatherer into the pockets of our citizens and say, "You shall never be heard in any court", is to destroy our country; is to destroy free government. It necessarily follows that there can be nothing left of a free government which does not permit its citizens to say whether taxes are being illegally exacted or wrongfully exacted or fraudulently exacted of the taxpaying citizen.

Mr. President, this particular matter has not any direct relation even to the so-called "gold-clause case", to which the distinguished Senator from Alabama adverted, or the resolution which yesterday was considered by the House of Representatives. This is a tax bill. This is a bill under which the Government will levy a tax and take the property of the citizen, and the citizen justly says, and always can say, and always will say in the United States, "I have a right to my day in court." We do not have to give him the right before we take the money from him. If subsequently we give him full right to go into court, we satisfy not only our doctrine but even our constitutional provisions themselves.

We may properly say that we will not let the citizen resort to the extraordinary remedy of injunction to stay the hand of the Government in the quick and often necessary collection of revenues which must be had to support the Government; but in the case of a piece of legislation dealing with the question of taxation of the citizen and say, "With respect to all taxes paid you shall not be heard, and are wholly without remedy in all the courts of this country, both State and Federal", is a proposition to which I could not for one moment give my assent.

In the bill before us, with respect to all taxes paid hereafter; that is, after the adoption of the pending amendment, the citizen, under conditions which, for the sake of this matter, we say are reasonable and which we accept, would be given his right to go into the courts. Here is an act of the Congress, and up to the date we amend it, it provides, "No citizen shall be heard, no citizen shall have his day in court." From the date when we amend it we will say, "The citizen may come into court and may be heard on these same questions." If we do not so amend it, it will destroy the whole theory of equality before the law, for which our entire system of Government certainly stands. The citizen who paid yesterday is without relief, the citizen who will pay tomorrow, after we shall pass this bill as amended, will be entitled to relief. That is the situation.

We are not asking that the bars be let down and the Government and its officers harassed. The bill provides that there may not be extraordinary remedies against them; they may not be stayed by injunction. The bill provides that only after the wrong is done may the citizen come in and have his hearing in court. It is a right which has been universally accorded from the beginning of the Government to this hour in all matters of direct taxation of the citizen for the support of his Government.

Our friends make much ado about the language which provides, in substance, that if the taxpayer who claims against the Government has passed on the tax, or if he has placed the tax upon the consumer by forcing him to pay it, he can have no recovery, and it is asserted that it would be a hopeless and a useless and a futile task to open up the inquiry at the hands of an aggrieved citizen. That may be. But we have taken that provision from the bill itself, from the very language of the Committee on Agriculture. We have taken the very language of those who now complain against the amendment which we offer, and we have said, "If under the conditions which you state the taxpayer, after the amendment of the law, may be heard, we simply insist that the taxpayer who paid his money before the amendment to the law may also be heard."

Mr. President, it is unnecessary to do so, and I do so only for the sake of entering in the RECORD my own position upon the question, but I wish to say that I think this provision would be held to be wholly nugatory——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time on the amendment has expired.

Mr. GEORGE. I will take 5 minutes on the bill, if I may split my time.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator takes 5 minutes on the bill he cannot speak again on the bill. I merely mention this in order that the Senator may have warning of it.

Mr. GEORGE. I did not understand the Senator's suggestion.

Mr. NORRIS. The unanimous-consent agreement provides that only one speech may be made on the bill by any Senator.

Mr. CONNALLY. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CONNALLY. Could not the Senator from Georgia count the 15 minutes he has already consumed as having been used on the bill, and then speak 15 minutes more on the bill if he desired?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There can be but one speech on the bill by any one Senator.

Mr. GEORGE. I shall speak on the bill in my time. I am not opposed to the bill. I have some serious doubts about certain provisions of the measure, but I have desired to support the bill. I do desire to have it in reasonably good shape in order that I may be able to support it.

Mr. President, not for the purpose of raising any additional argument, because I think the argument out of place at this point, but in order to make my own position entirely clear I wish to repeat the statement I made before the Chair reminded me that my time on the amendment had expired, and that is, that the provision in this bill to be found on page 58, in my opinion, would be held by the court to be void if the court should decide against the power of the Congress to levy the particular tax and for the particular purpose originally authorized in the Agricultural Adjustment Act. In other words, Mr. President, the provision in question is not precisely nor exactly a denial of consent to be sued, but it is rather the denial of the jurisdiction of the court to entertain the suit. In the same section there is a provision which takes certain specified cases out from under the language contained in the committee amendment.

For myself I am fully convinced that if the Supreme Court should finally hold that the power delegated by the original Agricultural Adjustment Act to levy the particular tax—not to levy an excise tax, because that is not in dispute—but to levy a particular tax and for the particular purpose specified in that act is wholly wanting, then this provision in the bill would likewise be entirely void.

Mr. President, for some of the reasons which have been stated by others much better than myself, and for some of the reasons which I have tried feebly to indicate, I do not wish to be a party to the passage of any tax bill which exacts such payments from the citizen, be he the farmer who is raising hogs and selling them on the market and himself paying the processing tax or the processor who processes any of the commodities on which the tax is imposed.

For the benefit of the distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], who earlier directed the inquiry to me raising the question whether the farmer who had absorbed the tax could have any redress under this bill as drawn, I may say to him that in my judgment, if the bill shall be properly and liberally construed in favor of the taxpayer, he might have redress, for, if in lieu of paying the tax himself he creates the purchaser his agent to pay the tax for him, and hands him over the money, or says, "Take it out of the price of my hogs", he is the payer of that tax.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I was called from the Chamber and have not heard all of the speech of the able Senator from Georgia. I agree in toto with that portion of the speech which I have heard. I wonder if the Senator will distinguish—or has he done so during my absence—between the instant case and the bill to bar suits on Government bonds? They are not comparable at all. There is no similarity. Has the Senator made that argument?

Mr. GEORGE. I made that statement, but without argument.

Mr. ASHURST. I did not hear it.

Mr. GEORGE. I did not care to go into it at length. There is no similarity between them whatever.

Mr. ASHURST. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator is correct. One would hardly afford any support to the other on principle or even in sound morality.

Mr. ASHURST. I did not hear that statement. I am glad to know that it is in the RECORD.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, Mr. President; I made that statement.

I have spoken a brief period beyond the 15 minutes allotted me, and at the same time I have finished all I desire to say on this amendment. It seems to me that the Senate should be glad to accept this amendment, and until the Senate acts to the contrary I cannot believe that it will not do so.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, let me say, to begin with, that I agree fully with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] that the Senate has the right to adopt the amendment on page 58. I am not bothered about our right to do so. I think we have a perfect constitutional right to do that. Of course, if the whole law should be declared to be unconstitutional that amendment, if agreed to, would go down with the rest of it. If the pending amendment should be defeated I should vote against striking out the committee amendment on page 58, though I should dislike to see that amendment, unmodified, go into the law.

The provision on page 58 of the bill denies to certain taxpayers any right to go into court and takes away the jurisdiction of the courts. On page 61, with respect to the same taxpayers who have paid on a different date, the right is given them to go before the Internal Revenue Bureau and also to go into court in an effort to recover payment of a tax which under the bill they are given the right to recover.

The amendment on page 61, if agreed to, would put all the taxpayers in the same class. Those who have paid a tax before the passage of this bill and those who may pay a tax after the passage of the bill are all put together in the same class. That is the effect of this amendment. It seems to me it provides a fair solution of the difficulty. It seems to me it ought not to be objected to by anyone.

I am not one who claims that the Government ought to throw down the bars and let everyone sue it. I tried to make my position plain on that question yesterday. For its own preservation, the Government must, as a rule, deny to the citizen the right to sue it unless the Government consents to be sued.

I think in every State of the Union there is a provision or a method adopted by law for the recovery of taxes which may be found, after collection, to have been illegally or wrongfully collected. All the States do not provide the same remedy. They provide different methods. I think the right to recover taxes illegally or wrongfully collected is given to the citizens in every State of the Union and is given by the Federal Government, so far as I know. If the income-tax payer is compelled to pay too much or is wrongfully or illegally compelled to pay, we provide by law a method for him to recover those taxes which have been wrongfully collected. That is fair and right, is it not? Would it be fair to deny the citizen that right? To deny him that right would be unfair and unjust, would it not?

The only thing this amendment does is to give the proper remedy to recover to the citizen who claims his taxes were wrongfully or illegally collected, or who claims to have paid too much.

In one section of the bill the right is given to him to sue to recover if he shall pay the tax after the passage of this bill, but denies it to him if he has paid the tax prior to the passage of this bill.

What must the citizen now show with reference to the processing tax? If he has paid a processing tax and is trying to recover it, the burden of proof is on him to show that he has not passed it on to somebody else. He must show that he has not taken it out of the man from whom he purchased the product. He must show several other things, all of which I think are necessary, all of which are fair. The burden is placed entirely upon him. It that not right? Is there anything unfair about that? Is there anything unjust in it? If he has paid in any given case $10, we will say, whereas the law provides that he should only pay $5, should he not get back the $5? Will the Government of the United States deny him that right? No citizen, no business man, if he is honest, would deny it to his neighbor or to his fellow citizen. If he has paid a processing tax and passed it on to the consumer, then he ought not to recover, and this amendment will not permit him to recover. If he paid a processing tax, and when he bought the article upon which the tax is levied from a producer deducted it from the price he paid the producer, he could not, under this amendment, recover that tax, and, of course, he should not.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. From a practical standpoint, suppose a processor says, "No; I did not take this tax out of the producer, and I did not pass it on. I just figured it in my cost." There are a great many elements of cost. How is the Government going to contest that claim? How is it going to disprove that statement?

Mr. NORRIS. In the first place, the processor has got to prove the fact; he has got to prove that he did not deduct the tax or pass it on. Suppose he bought a hog of me and the market price was so-and-so, as the Senator from Georgia has already described; suppose that the price of the hog at the place of sale was 5 cents a pound, and he deducted from that 5 cents a pound, the amount of the processing tax. There is a transaction that could easily be shown by proof; and when he comes to make his proof he would run right up against that snag; he could not prove it, because it is not true, and he would not be entitled to recover.

Mr. CONNALLY. Suppose the next man who bought a hog there did not take out the processing tax?

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to answer that question, the processor has got to pay the tax; and he either pays it out of his own pocket or out of the price.

Mr. CONNALLY. Exactly. The point I was trying to make is that the processor will come along and say, "No; I did not take it out. I simply would have made more profit if I had not been compelled to pay the tax." How is the Government going to come back at him?

Mr. GEORGE. The market price on the given date is a matter of record.

Mr. NORRIS. It would be very susceptible of proof; the markets every day of the year are known in every place in the United States, and it is not for the Government to prove that he did not deduct or pass on the tax; he himself has got to prove that he did. He must make the proof; the Government does not have to make it. There would be, as there always is in every litigation, some difficulty, it is true; but I do not know why we should deny an honest man the privilege of getting back what has been illegally collected from him just because there might be some difficulty on account of the dishonest man. The whole fabric of government is burdened with the dishonest man; that is true in every line of business. If we had no burglars or thieves or men who commit other crimes, if there were no men of that kind, it would lessen the burden of the honest taxpayer who obeys the law and never disobeys it.

His burden is increased; it might be in this case. I can imagine that someone might go into court and allege that he had not passed the tax on; that he had not taken it out of the producer, and perhaps prove it; and I can imagine that he would probably have to offer perjured testimony in order to do it. He might be so cute about it that he could not be discovered. That is true of all litigation; we run that risk everywhere.

Mr. BANKHEAD and Mr. RUSSELL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHAVEZ in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield first to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator made a statement which I hardly think is accurate; that if a man had paid $10 when he should only have paid $5 he would be denied the right to recover. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that suits of that character are not barred by this section, as the Senator will see if he will examine the provision at the bottom of page 58. I ask him to note this provision:

> The provisions of this subsection shall not apply to (1) any overpayment of tax which results from an error in the computation of the tax, or (2) duplicate payments of any tax, or (3) any refund or credit under subsection (a) or (c) of section 15.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, the case I gave probably never would happen; it was only given as an illustration.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I wanted to point out to the Senator that provision.

Mr. NORRIS. If we concede now, as I think we ought to concede and will have to concede, that there may be cases where a processor has paid a processing tax and has neither passed it on nor taken it out of the producer and still has unsold the goods on which the tax was paid, in that kind of case, who will say that he should not recover a tax wrongfully paid?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that the whole object of this provision is to prevent the refunding of a tax on account of invalidity that may result from a decision that this is an unconstitutional delegation of power.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know how much time I have left, and I should dislike my time to be taken up by questions; but I do not wish to be discourteous to the Senator, and I yield.

Mr. RUSSELL. I merely wish to inquire of the Senator from Nebraska if there is any general statute of limitations on the time within which a suit may be filed for the recovery of taxes illegally collected?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think there is in this bill.

Mr. RUSSELL. It occurs to me there certainly should be some definite time limit fixed.

Mr. NORRIS. There is the general statute of limitations.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, there is such a provision in the original act, to which the pending bill is merely an amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. A man pays a wrongful tax today; we pass this bill tomorrow; and the next day his neighbor pays a wrongful tax. We deny one the right to recover and we accord the right to the other. I do not know how anybody can defend that discrimination.

Moreover, I will say to the Senator, I have no doubt that if the original amendment on page 58 had gone to a vote it would have been overwhelmingly defeated, and I was anxious to save the situation. I am a friend of this bill; I believe in it; and I am startled and amazed at some of the objections that are urged against it. I realize it is very difficult to understand it all; perhaps no man, unless it be the administrator of the law, can understand all its ramifications; but this bill is a sincere, honest effort to help the producer, to give the farmer some recompense for his toil, and I should very much dislike to have it contain an injustice which might drive votes away from it. I am seeking to help pass the bill; I want it enacted into law; I am grasping at it almost as a drowning man grasps at a straw; but it seems to me that when we put into the measure something that is admittedly unjust we will drive votes away from it and perhaps defeat it entirely.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Nebraska has expired.

LOUISIANA'S RIGHTS

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, yesterday I was away from the city when I read an announcement in the public press, sent out by the news agencies, confirming what had been sent out the day before while I was in the city of New Orleans. The announcement was to the effect that President Roosevelt and his Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Ickes, had sent me word that I would have nothing to do with spending any P. W. A. money in Louisiana. I do not know just how the President sent me word. According to the newspaper headlines, this is my official notice. I do not know why the Secretary of the Interior should continue to address me in communications through these circumlocutious routes, but, nevertheless, that is their privilege apparently. I have no direct diplomatic contact with the gentleman, and I am not seeking any, and, therefore, since, apparently, these pronouncements are intended for the public, I will undertake to respond in kind.

The way the President talks to me and the Secretary of the Interior talks to me reminds me of a mother-in-law and a son-in-law who lived together in Shreveport, La., and who did not speak to each other. Quite often the daughter of the mother-in-law, the wife of the son-in-law, would go out of town, and there would be no one there except the mother-in-law and son-in-law, and they would have to eat together.

They had a means by which they would communicate one with the other by talking to the cat. The mother-in-law would address her remarks to the cat and the son-in-law would respond by addressing his remarks to the cat, and then the mother-in-law would reply by telling the cat something else. Apparently such a practice has grown up in the city of Washington, because I constantly read of various and sundry ultimatums addressed to me by the President, but I never see the handwriting of the President, I never hear his voice, and no direct communication comes to me. I am merely advised through the front pages of the newspapers that the President has told me something I can do, or something I cannot do, or something that he will not do, or something that he will not let anybody else in the United States do. So I must, in view of the circumstances, undertake to make some answer to what has been said by the only means that is left to me. I will not, however, take a great deal of the time of the Senate, because the National Broadcasting Co. has very agreeably given me from 8 until 8:30 o'clock tonight to speak over its Nation-wide system, and so I will not have to belabor the Senate; I will take my time addressing the American people over the radio; and the remarks which I now undertake to deliver will be addressed to my colleagues of the Senate.

The State of Louisiana, Mr. President, does not bow low, particularly, in order to get funds distributed by the Government; and I do not see why the President continues to make these announcements; I do not see why Mr. Ickes continues to make them. Several weeks ago on the floor of the Senate I made answer to one such pronouncement. It has already been stated that I have nothing to do with the funds they spend in Louisiana, that they will not spend any money in Louisiana, and that various and sundry dire consequences will be visited upon the people of Louisiana unless something is done, I presume to me or somebody else down there.

Now, as we approach the period of only 5 months before an election, we receive the statement that the State of Louisiana is to have none of the P. W. A. funds. That is not a gracious answer or gesture to the generous attitude we took last year, when we allowed five of our eight Representatives in the other branch of Congress to come back, on the ground that they had deserted me and had hooked up with Mr. Roosevelt. We allowed those gentlemen to come back under the understanding that, inasmuch as they were avowedly anti-Long and pro-Roosevelt, they could get money from the Public Treasury which otherwise would not be available to Louisiana.

Now, he has announced that these five deserters, unlike Judas Iscariot and Benedict Arnold, are not to get their 30 pieces of silver, and, therefore, we will have to remove the five of them from public office unless he changes his attitude between now and election day. It is very unkind. Judas Iscariot was paid; Arnold was paid; I have received nothing about which I can complain; but my colleagues in the other House, who have deserted on the ground that they were going to come back with the loaves and fishes, lo and behold, on the very eve of the election, appear with their hands empty and their faces blank, and with nothing to give their constituents as a reward for their infidelity to the party that elected them to the office they now hold. They have my sincere sympathy but will not have my help in the political campaign, and a lack of votes will be the answer for having trusted the gentleman whom I myself trusted once too often.

Our State, however, has had more things than this to stand. We do not need the help of the Government to borrow money. The P. W. A. would only let Louisiana and the municipalities in Louisiana have money on bonds issued by the State. We do not need the United States to borrow money for the State of Louisiana. If the State of Louisiana wants to borrow any money it can borrow without having to sell bonds to the United States. It has better credit than the United States. The only way the United States can sell a bond is to make a bank take it. The State of Louisiana sells its bonds at a premium without having to compel any bank to take them, because our revenues exceed our expenditures. We have money in the bank. We have money in the treasury, millions of dollars of it. I almost feel affluent when I come back here from the State of Louisiana, knowing the condition of our treasury as compared to the one in this citadel.

However, yesterday the State of Louisiana sold some bonds. They sold for $103.80, $3.80 above par, so I do not suppose we are afflicted. As to the money we spend, we receive a dollar in value for each dollar of expenditure. We are not going to come to Washington, D. C., and put up our bonds, which the whole world is crying for an opportunity to buy, and then have the Federal Government go down there and supervise the expenditure of the money and get about 3 cents' worth of value for each dollar of money expended, like the Federal Government is getting elsewhere.

We do not want the leaves swept from one side of the street to the other, and then swept back again from the other side of the street to where they were in the first place. We do not want any dirt removed from one side of the railroad track to a hole on the other side, and then have the hole dug out and the dirt moved back to the first side. Whenever we spend a dollar of money for which the State of Louisiana has given a bond, or for which a subdivision of the State has given a bond, it will be spent in a sane way for something the State needs, and the State will have a dollar there with which to pay off the obligation it has incurred for a public improvement.

Let these gentlemen discontinue for a while their statements that Louisiana has been cut off the credit list of the Federal Government. We are very sorry we ever had anything to do with them—I mean in connection with their loan program. A while back we sold them $7,000,000 of Louisiana highway bonds, which today sell on the public market at 104. They have taken those $7,000,000 of bonds every time we have started to float a public issue of bonds, and let the word go out that they were just about to put those bonds on the market, to try to suppress and depress the price of Louisiana bonds. Let them go out and sell their $7,000,000 of Louisiana highway bonds. There is a market for them. They paid us $1 and the world is bidding $1.04. We have a good financial condition, we can get along financially without them, and we shall be glad to wait until the coming fall of 1936, when they will be glad to do business again with Louisiana.

The public press reports that only the doubtful States are to be favored by the Federal Government. Our State is not a doubtful State. Louisiana could not be put in the Roosevelt column with $5,000,000,000. The State of Louisiana will never vote to send Franklin Delano Roosevelt back to the Presidency of the United States. I make that statement 4 months from the eve of my campaign for reelection in the State of Louisiana, and I am not yet opposed. Let them get out an opponent for me down there if they want to find out how Louisiana stands, and we will put the issue up away in advance as to whether Louisiana under any circumstances will stand for the tyrannical and unconstitutional form of arbitrary, ransacking government which has been foisted on the people by this administration. Try it out in advance, I say to those who want to try it. Louisiana is not a doubtful State.

Mr. President, I undertook to give the administration very good advice. I gave it good advice. I advised the administration on banking. Later on they saw fit to take some of my advice. I advised the administration on the McCarran amendment. It was voted down. Today I picked up a newspaper clipping and remarked to my friend the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] that I find the administration has concluded that we who fought here for the prevailing wage on public employment have now been sustained by the same administration which used the force of its power to try to vote us down in the United States Senate, which even caused gentlemen in this body to switch their votes from one side to the other in support of the administration, who now come out and announce their belief in the principle of this kind of a program. To the junior Senator from Nevada, who carried the brunt of the great fight for the prevailing wage, to his courage and foresight, belongs the credit for the victory now accomplished through the belated act of the President. The toilers of this country may well give credit to Senator McCARRAN if in the future the wage structure of this country is maintained and American labor is kept out of peonage. I am happy that I joined with the junior Senator from Nevada in his progressive fight.

I referred once before on the floor of the Senate to the tea party held in Boston. This country has observed its results ever since. One was that those paying the taxes should receive their share of the taxes. No tax that is not to some extent justified by the representation of the country should be levied. Louisiana pays, in one little item, a tax of $24,000,000 a year into the Federal Treasury. I understand that in income taxes alone $24,000,000 last year was paid in Louisiana.

Does the administration in Washington mean to say it is going to use the State of Louisiana as a tax-gathering ground and that it is going to deny the State of Louisiana the benefit of the expenditures of those taxes in that State? I say that will not be the case. Not only do I say this administration will not be permitted to do it; but, if it is necessary that we wait until another administration—the State of Louisiana can afford to wait. We are so much better off than the supposed-to-be favored States—those that are supposed to have remained in the good graces of the present administration—that we feel well enough alone without having to ingratiate ourselves to this particular administration at this time.

Fall is coming when the Supreme Court will reassemble. I have been advised by the authorities of our State that Louisiana will file a suit in the Supreme Court of the United States, where we will test—and successfully, without any question in my mind—the right of the Federal Government to go into a State and set up boards and bureaus to carry on business not authorized by the Federal Constitution. They have set up an educational board in the State of Louisiana far apart from our State board of education.

They have not only set up an educational board but they have set up this board and that board and some other kind of a board. They have every kind of a board in that State, none of which is authorized by the Constitution of this country. We are going into the Supreme Court of the United States when October shall have reached us and there, as a sovereign State, ask that Court for its permission to file a suit to enjoin this usurpation of State functions.

Louisiana has done a great deal to preserve the integrity of this country and to preserve the integrity of the other States. In 1803, or soon thereafter, we were the ground of the Burr conspiracy. Many of our citizens and their families have been condemned for nearly a century because of the efforts they made for what was the American country at that time.

In 1815, when the British Army was in charge of Washington, D. C., and when it had whipped the whole United States, it did not have anything but Louisiana left to fight. Our envoys were in Belgium negotiating for surrender, and the peace treaty of Ghent was no more nor less than a surrender.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Louisiana on the amendment has expired.

Mr. LONG. I shall take my time on the bill.

It was the army of General Pakenham, which had been led by the Duke of Wellington in the Peninsular campaign, which came to America for the purpose of taking charge of the United States when the peace treaty was made. The peace treaty was made so that they would take the United States with the exception of the 13 little States which were in existence at that time. It was the army which Wellington had in the Peninsular campaign that met the Louisianians and two companies of Tennesseeans under Jackson at New Orleans. They repulsed that army, veterans of the Peninsular campaign, and it left the State of Louisiana, but it still was able to go back to England, and it whipped Napoleon at Waterloo. It was the army which Jackson whipped at New Orleans with Louisianians that whipped Napoleon at Waterloo. It was the same army that had defeated the French in the Peninsular campaign. Little has been said of that.

Back in 1860 Louisiana undertook to prevent the secession of the Southern States. If it had not been for the fact that Texas on one side, Mississippi on another side, and Arkansas on the top, seceded from the confederation of the United States, there never would have been any secession by the State of Louisiana.

Before that, in 1836, when the Mexicans had been successful over the Texan troops in battle after battle, Sam Houston came to New Orleans and raised an army which went through the old road by Fort Jessup and went by the old route through Galveston and up to San Jacinto, and it was largely the Louisianans who whipped the Mexicans at the Battle of San Jacinto, reenforced by soldiers and stragglers from Texas and other States. [Laughter.]

Some of those things are not mentioned. Nevertheless, that State stood for the preservation of the individual rights of States. It stood for the preservation of the Constitution of the United States as long as it could. It stands today, with all these ravages, practically united. There is hardly a voice of political opposition in the entire State of Louisiana that can be heard, there is hardly a whisper that can be heard today in defense of the kind of outrages that we hear hurled at us from Washington, D. C. A lone, solitary character undertakes to draw a salary, the mayor of the city of New Orleans. He will be there until the next recall election, perhaps; and what is heard from that discredited source is the only thing that sounds a single whisper in Louisiana in defense of the ultimatums that are hurled from the President's chair and from that of the Secretary of the Interior, if the newspaper accounts correctly report what they say. As to those I have no means of verification. I must accept them as they come repeatedly, and there never has been any denial of them in the past.

Now, gentlemen of the Senate, this little case has recently happened: Louisiana State University was promised a loan by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. I want Senators to listen to this little statement of fact so that they may glorify themselves and their stand with or against this administration.

Louisiana State University applied to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for a loan. They came back the other day and said, "We have been given the loan. It has all been signed, sealed, and delivered. The engineer is with us here. We are fixing to begin the work."

I said, "Hold on. Have you got the money yet?"

"No; but they told us the money is ours. They sent the engineer with us. We are letting the contract tomorrow, and we are going ahead."

I said, "Just a moment. When are you going to get the money?"

They said, "All we have to do is to send our bonds up there to get the money."

I said, "Well, I should like to advise with you and the Governor for just a few minutes. Let me tell you something: Do not announce that you have that money. Do not announce that you are going to do that work. I know those men. I know this administration. I have had their word. Do not think you are going to get that money until you have every dollar of it here."

"Oh, no; we can go ahead."

I said, "You had better not." I said, "Do not announce it." Finally they were persuaded by the Governor and myself not to announce that they had the money; but the Reconstruction Finance Corporation itself announced that it had completed the lending of $1,700,000 to Louisiana State University for needed improvements at Louisiana State University. Still I said to them, "Do not turn a shovel of that $1,700,000 of work. I know that outfit up there. You will never get a dollar of the money."

They thought those men would go out and let the contracts, and the State would be embarrassed; but, oh, no; they did not do any such thing. Lo and behold, on yesterday the Reconstruction Finance Corporation called up and said "there was a little something about it that they had to look into for a little while." [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator is attacking the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Is it not true that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation made a loan to Louisiana in the amount of fifteen or twenty million dollars for building a bridge across the river, and is not that bridge now under construction?

Mr. LONG. No; that is not so. They bought $7,000,000 of our bonds at par, which can be sold today at $1.04 on the dollar, and they have been using those bonds to depress our market.

Mr. CONNALLY. Just a minute.

Mr. LONG. They will not sell them, and they wait, every time, until we start to sell bonds, and act as though they are going to shove these bonds out to keep people from buying Louisiana bonds.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me ask the Senator whether he did not personally request and urge and secure from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation the purchase by it of those bonds?

Mr. LONG. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Then, what is the Senator complaining about?

Mr. LONG. I am not complaining.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator says the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bought the bonds, and so forth, and it did not do the State any good; but the Senator admits that it was through his agency that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bought those bonds, and the purpose of buying them was to build a bridge across the Mississippi River. That is true, is it not?

Mr. LONG. It is not all true; no.

Mr. CONNALLY. What is the error about it?

Mr. LONG. I will answer the Senator's question when he shall have finished it.

Mr. CONNALLY. What was the $7,000,000 for?

Mr. LONG. I will answer the question.

We built that bridge across the Mississippi River. By the way, it is known as the "Huey P. Long Bridge", as almost all other good things are known down there. [Laughter in the galleries.] The Reconstruction Finance Corporation wanted a railroad bridge built. They tried to finance it through the railroads, and could not do it. Then they had to call on us to do it.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me ask the Senator——

Mr. LONG. Just a moment until I get through.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

Mr. LONG. Just a minute, now.

Mr. CONNALLY. I think the Senator is unfair if he does not yield.

Mr. LONG. No; I am not. I will yield as soon as I get through answering the Senator's last question.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the Senator chooses not to yield, of course, his statement cannot be corrected.

Mr. LONG. I will yield as soon as I finish answering the Senator's last question. Let me finish it first.

So we agreed to put up $7,000,000 worth of Louisiana highway bonds that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation would buy to build a bridge, and we did. Now, that is all right. I have no complaint about that. That was done under Hoover. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let there be order in the galleries.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order on the conduct of the occupants of the galleries. The Chair knows his duty, and I hope he will perform it. I know he wishes to perform it. This is not a vaudeville show, though it may seem to be; and the occupants of the galleries are supposed to preserve order. I insist that the Chair either make them be quiet or put them out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The occupants of the galleries will keep quiet.

Mr. CONNALLY. They are not doing it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let there be order.

Mr. LONG. If the Senator from Texas will not interfere with the occupants of the galleries, I am satisfied they will not laugh so much.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana will pardon the Chair just one moment. The occupants of the galleries are the guests of the Senate. The Chair hopes they will comply with the rules of the Senate and will maintain order.

Mr. LONG. The Senator from Texas did not hear the rest of my statement. The Hoover administration, therefore, bought $7,000,000 of our bonds, because there was no general or public bond market at the time. I thanked Mr. Hoover for it, if that will do any good.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Why is the Senator talking about Mr. Hoover? He started out on the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. He got his money through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. He asked for it, and begged them to give it to him, and they gave it to him.

Mr. LONG. No; I do not beg anybody to do anything.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator said a minute ago that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation wanted to build a bridge across the Mississippi. I should like to ask him if the Reconstruction Finance Corporation initiated the bridge, or if the people of Louisiana and the Senator from Louisiana did not initiate it and go to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and ask them for the money.

Mr. LONG. All right. Now, if the Senator will sit down, I will answer his question.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator will sit down when he chooses.

Mr. LONG. I mean, if he is through. I would just as soon see the Senator stand as sit down. He is one of the most handsome men in this body.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. It is against the rules of the Senate to make personal allusions to Senators.

Mr. LONG. All right.

Mr. CONNALLY. And I do not care for allusions of that kind from the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. I am complimenting the Senator. I do not mean to reflect on the Senator.

Mr. CONNALLY. I know; but I desire to say right now that the Senator from Louisiana need not get funny with me, either on the floor of the Senate or elsewhere.

Mr. LONG. Let the Senator stay out of my time, then.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will proceed in order.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator does not have to yield if he does not wish to yield.

Mr. LONG. Then, I will not yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the Senator gets up here and makes statements that are not justified against the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and other agencies, so long as I have the right to stand on this floor I am going to try to see that he sticks within the facts.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the Senator has already taken about 10 minutes of my time, and I did not have much left. I do not yet know what he has asked, but I will answer what I think he should have asked me.

The Louisiana bridge has been built. They took $7,000,000 of our bonds. They have been paid interest on those bonds up to date, and they can be sold at 104 today; and we do not owe anything to anybody except the Hoover administration for that.

Now, coming back to what I was about to say—I have forgotten what I was talking about when the Senator interrupted me—the Louisiana State University was told by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation—of course, I know who tells the Reconstruction Finance Corporation what to do—to go ahead and spend the money. They did not do it, and they did not announce the loan, either; but the Reconstruction Finance Corporation insisted on announcing that they had appropriated $1,700,000 to Louisiana State University. Now they come out—they have not done it yet, but they did what I told the president of the university they would do. I warned him about the kind of government we have up here. I know them. I have had dealings with them; and our authorities in Louisiana saved themselves from that humiliation by reason of the fact that I told them when they came back, and when the Reconstruction Finance Corporation published this statement, to pay no attention to it; that they would find some kind of a way of pulling their usual trick, and they did. They have not done it yet; they will do it today or tomorrow, after having made their own announcement to the public press.

The people of the United States are entitled to know with whom they are dealing. That is the kind of government with which they are dealing. That is the kind of faith they can have in the Government; and we are not going to mingle and mess ourselves up with that kind of a flimflamming outfit which calls itself a government. Louisiana will run the affairs of Louisiana. The 2,300,000 people of that sovereign State, one of the 48 stars of the flag, will run the affairs of the State of Louisiana through the elected representatives of that State. It will not be subjected to the domination of autocrats or bureaucrats. It will not stand for the fiats that come from Washington. It will not be run over by the agents of sabotage and plunder, nor will it allow itself to be enslaved and put under financial obligations for money to be wasted wantonly, as the funds that they have spent in that State have been wasted in the days recently past.

As far as Mr. Roosevelt's announcements and Mr. Ickes' announcements are concerned, I suggest to those gentlemen, if they have any messages to deliver to me, that they send them to me in person. If they have any ultimatums to deliver to me, let them send them to me through the regular channels. I always write them letters when I wish to tell them anything; and usually, in order that the letters may reach them, give the letters out at the desk of the Senate in order that they may not fail to reach the hands of those for whom they are intended. Thus do I attract their notice.

I will say this to them: I am not afraid of them in any political campaign of any kind or character. Louisiana has set an example to the other States. I ask the other 47 States and the politicians of the other 47 States to take notice. I ask them to follow us. Defy this kind of autocracy! Defy this kind of tyranny! If you want to be politically powerful, so much that they cannot even oppose you in your own State, then I say to every politician in the United States, follow the example we have set. Tell that gang of scuttlers that your State runs the business of the State and that the politicians of your State will have nothing to do with the untrustworthy characters who are placed in charge of the dispensation of funds, who undertake to give their pledge one day and to withdraw it the next day, and to keep everyone suspended in a state of uncertainty so that their ravages and their plunder may menace the welfare of the citizen who most of all would expect the Federal Government to be stable and trustworthy, at least believable.

Mr. President, how much time have I left?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 16 minutes more.

Mr. LONG. I will not take 16 minutes; I will not have to take that long. Now, I can talk a little politics. Mr. Roosevelt will remember one thing to his dying day; he will remember to his dying day that he was warned along certain lines by men who were absolutely sincere in the Democratic Party. Among those lines was the principle that he could not enter upon a bureaucratic system of running the American Government on the Hoover order without wrecking the Democratic Party and without wrecking himself in doing it.

Mr. President, I am a citizen of the United States Republic first and a follower of Almighty God, who allowed its creation. To them I owe my first allegiance, to my people next, and last to my party.

The party which undertakes to shield this kind of a situation commits itself to the bowwows for eternity. The party that raises the flag of waste, destruction, bureaucracy and autocracy, the party which allows to be seated in its high councils men who defy investigation, and about whom there dare not be an investigation, men who allow millions and billions of dollars of funds to be pilfered willfully through the advertised pronouncements of agents in these States that it is done only for the sake of political monstrosities—the party which rears itself behind that sort of thing; the party which rears itself behind an organization which has spent more money to bring this country to where it is now than was spent by the Government from the day of Washington up to the day of Woodrow Wilson; the party which sees a $28,000,000,000 deficit grow and grow and grow, which undertakes to take a Nation, a union of States, and bond them for all the millions and billions of bonds now issued by the Government, and then send their "heelers" and others to misuse and squander and waste that money—the party that raises that emblem invites destruction, it invites wreck, it invites ruin, and I am for the wreckage of that party before I will be for the wreckage of the United States.

Mr. President, what kind of a party have we, which I contend we ought to save from ruin? Who is it that now says that the United States Supreme Court ought to be censured for its rulings? I understand from the public press—I have no other means of acquiring my information—that the Court is roundly condemned for its rulings on N. R. A. and other high courts for their rulings on A. A. A. If courts say that A. A. A. is unconstitutional and un-American, the courts are condemned.

But who was it who first said that this system of restricting production of agricultural commodities through any kind of process other than the Sabbatical law was un-American? The President of the United States stood on the front steps of the capitol at Topeka, Kans., and he is the man who sounded the warning to the United States that everything that is contained in the A. A. A. is un-American and void on principle. Yet, if the Supreme Court and the inferior courts of the United States set at naught these very things that were condemned in the course of a political campaign, it is urged that these be the basis of a campaign for recognition in order that the Court may be repudiated for having decided against such a law.

Let me give this warning: When you go before the people of the South, the North, the East, and the West, pointing up the spearhead of this Democratic fiction and amalgamated fiction of government, with the Blue Eagles and screaming emblems of all kinds and characters that are supposed to haul down the Stars and Stripes and the Constitution, you are going to find out that the people will uphold the Constitution of the United States before they recognize such emblems of any party.

Louisiana is going to take that stand. Louisiana is willing to lead in maintaining that position. That is where Louisiana will be found, and it is not within the power of all the finances that a Government can bring into a State, or all the Presidential power that can be exerted, to change the votes of the people of Louisiana to the surrender of State sovereignty.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, before the vote is taken, I desire to send to the desk the original amendment in the nature of a substitute, which contains the correct punctuation. There is no change in the substance. It is a mere matter of punctuation of the original text.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). The Senator from Georgia sends to the desk a modification of the punctuation in the amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Georgia whether we are voting upon the amendment as a whole? There are several distinct parts of the amendment, and I thought we had unanimous consent that we would vote on it as an entirety.

Mr. GEORGE. I so understood, and I am offering it as a substitute for subsection (d), which starts on page 61 and goes down to line 12 on page 62.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, as modified, in the nature of a substitute for the committee amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARKLEY in the chair). Ninety Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], as modified, in the nature of a substitute for the committee amendment.

Mr. McNARY. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, yesterday the able Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] made the statement which I now quote:

> I have no doubt there are instances where the tax has not been shifted, where it has been borne by the processor, where it has been paid and borne by the taxpayer. I read an instance a few days ago of a tobacco concern in New York who had paid a processing tax amounting to more than $200,000 and the tax exceeded the entire amount of its sales. In that case, whatever may happen in the future, at least up to date that concern has not shifted the tax. The probabilities are it will never be able to shift the tax entirely. The newspaper report indicated the concern was teetering on the brink of bankruptcy. In such a case there would be an actual loss sustained at the hands of the Government, the Government obligated to protect the citizen instead of ruining him.

With no thought of reflecting upon the sincerity of the Senator from Oklahoma, whose statement is based upon a newspaper report, I do not accept the statement as true that any tobacco concern paid a processing tax "amounting to more than $200,000 and (that) the tax exceeded the entire amount of its sales." No concern engaged in the usual processes of business would have a condition such as that. I can conceive of no circumstances that would pile up enough processed-tax tobacco in inventory on which the tax would be $200,000 and the sales less than the amount of the tax. Such a concern would not merely be teetering on the edge of bankruptcy; it would be bankrupt unless it had an astounding liquid capital and boundless credit.

The Senator from Oklahoma cited the case of one of the great cotton mills of New Hampshire, the Amoskeag Mills. He said:

> Last year its annual report showed that it had suffered a loss of more than $1,000,000, I believe $1,008,000. I speak from memory. It had paid a processing tax of $1,274,000 and had paid extra wages on account of the code amounting to $1,600,000. Those were expenses incurred at the command of its Government. It seems to me fairly clear that in that case the taxpayer had not been able to pass the tax on either forward or backward, but that it had suffered a loss, had sustained an actual damage in the transaction.

I do not accept the conclusion of the Senator from Oklahoma. I have taken pains to inquire into the financial statements of the Amoskeag Co. I find that for the year 1928 it operated at a profit of $960,698, and for 1929 at a profit of $1,065,534. When practically all other businesses began to suffer from depression, Amoskeag suffered in common with them. For 3 years it had operating losses—for the year 1930, a loss of $1,345,389; for 1931, $782,667; for 1932, a loss of $1,210,226. In 1933 the processing tax on cotton became effective as of August 1, 1933—the Amoskeag mills operated at a profit, the profit being $31,444. As for 1934 its operating loss was $1,008,458. I found that it treated the processing tax as a cost of business. Recovery of tax shows in sales figures. The balance sheet does not separate the item of processing taxes, either as expense or income.

With what consistency may the Senator from Oklahoma attribute the loss suffered by Amoskeag in 1934 to the processing tax, when for the 3 years 1930, 1931, and 1932, years of no processing tax, it operated at a loss?

The able Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], whose intellectuality has impressed itself upon this body, asserted here yesterday that he did not "hesitate to assert as a fact, and I could put it in evidence here if the facts were to be tried, that these taxes have not been passed on in all cases." He continued with the statement that—

> There are 65 cotton mills and knitting mills in my State of North Carolina which are now closed down. * * * In those 65 cotton mills and knitting mills are goods piled on the shelves unsold. The taxes are collected in the case of the cotton mill at what we call the breaker. That is where the cotton begins to enter into the process of manufacture. The tax has been assessed. In many cases the tax has been paid. But the goods have not been sold. The taxes on those mills have not been passed on, and those are 65 instances in one Commonwealth.

What do the facts recited by the Senator prove? Do they prove an injustice to the taxpayer? Do they prove damage to him? Is there a scintilla of proof that when the goods shall be sold the tax will not be passed on?

What the Senator states as a conclusion is a fact yet in suspense.

What shall constitute proof that a processor has not passed on the processing tax?

Shall it be accepted as proof that he himself absorbed the tax if he operated his business at a loss? That appears to be the accepted view of those who argue against the adoption of the committee amendment.

The evidence I have submitted in the case of Amoskeag establishes that in the years when there was no processing tax, no less than in 1934 when there was such a tax, the company operated at a loss.

Shall it be viewed as proof that the processor absorbs the tax if his factory is shut down and his shelves laden with unsold goods? There can be no proof that the tax will not be passed on when those goods shall be disposed of.

Suppose, when disposed of, they shall be sold at a loss. Carry the supposition further and assume the loss to be exactly equal to the amount of the processing tax paid. Will that establish that the tax was not passed on? The processing tax is but one element in the increased price of cotton goods. Higher wages to labor, attributable to N. R. A., account for 50 percent of the increase. If we are to reimburse the processor on the theory that his loss attests that he did not pass on the tax, why not pursue the principle further and enable him to sue because he operated at a loss under N. R. A. wages, the N. R. A. having been nullified as unconstitutional?

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MURPHY. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. What has the Senator to say about those cases where the mills have become bankrupt and are in the hands of receivers and still have unsold goods on their shelves?

Mr. MURPHY. I shall deal with that. I thought I had answered that question in part, but I shall deal with it further on.

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly the taxpayer has paid the tax in such cases and he will never have the tax refunded to him.

Mr. MURPHY. There is not any proof, I submit to the Senator from Georgia, that he will not have it refunded.

Mr. GEORGE. The processor is bankrupt already, and his stock of goods is in the hands of the receiver. What will the Senator have to say to innumerable cases where the tax has not been paid, where it is now in litigation, or because of the insolvency or lack of ready cash mills cannot pay the tax?

Mr. MURPHY. I will say to the Senator that he has no right and the Congress has no right to indulge the presumption because a concern which has paid taxes on its goods is bankrupt that the processing tax is the explanation of its bankruptcy and that it shall repay the taxes.

Mr. GEORGE. I did not say that. I referred to cases where the processors have paid the tax and cannot recoup it. I merely give the Senator those instances. I doubt seriously if the Senator knows the condition of the cotton-textile business in the South, because, if he did, he would understand that there are large amounts of uncollected taxes, and to allow those who have not paid to escape and to exclude the mill that has willingly and voluntarily complied with the law from even an opportunity to go into court and show that it had not passed on its tax would be a type of discrimination between citizens I believe the Senator would not approve.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator why does he conclude that those who have not paid will be excused from paying?

Mr. GEORGE. Suppose the law should be held to be unconstitutional?

Mr. BANKHEAD. We are ratifying the old law by this bill.

Mr. GEORGE. Then, suppose that the original act should be held to be unconstitutional?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Of course, if we just assume that we have no valid bill here, that presents a different situation.

Mr. GEORGE. Of course, if the tax should be held not to be illegal or invalid or unfair or unjust, nobody could ever recover it.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, I should like to make this observation in reply to the Senator from Georgia: That industries have paid the higher wages imposed by the N. R. A., and the fact that a processor has paid the processing tax imposed by another act of Congress is not any reason why we should permit a recovery of the processing taxes or their abatement.

Is the demand for suit on this ground withheld because the processing tax is an easier mark to shoot at than are wages or because there are less involvments in attacking the processing tax than in attacking wages paid labor?

The senior Senator from South Carolina the other day said that Japan buys our cotton here, pays the freight around the world to her factories, where it is converted into cotton goods, and sells those goods with return freight, compensatory processing tax and tariff added, in American markets at less than the price for which goods of American manufacture are sold. Surely that cannot be viewed as proof that the processing tax is responsible for the condition of the textile industry, because Japan pays not only the processing tax but the tariff on the goods she exports to us.

Cotton has a competitor in rayon, and rayon is competing with Japanese silk. Has the competition of rayon anything to do with the plight of the textile mills? It would appear that it has, because cotton textile manufacturers are in many instances turning their plants to the manufacture of rayon. In order to be consistent with the principle advanced here, the alleged equitable principle that taxpayers shall be permitted to recover damages, are we not obligated to reimburse the cotton textile processors as damages suffered in the amount of the capital outlay needed for the conversion of their plants into plants for the manufacture of rayon?

The cotton mills of New England pay freight on the raw cotton of the South transported to them. Many of them have moved to the South so as to avoid that item of cost. At one time we had much the same condition in Iowa. The Iowa processor of pork had a 50-cent advantage over the Chicago packer because he sent the hog dressed to market, whereas the Chicago packer brought the hog from the point of production on the hoof. The necessities of the situation compelled Chicago packers to buy or build plants in Iowa in order to equalize the competition, and they did so. That is the way progressive business meets many situations. As a case in point, recently the Tobin Packing Co., of New York, established a hog-killing plant in Fort Dodge, Iowa.

It is asserted that some pork-packing plants have been forced out of business by the processing tax. I think investigation of these plants would disclose that, processing tax or no processing tax, they would have been compelled to go out of business. Today we have this situation, that the big packers are absorbing the little fellows; buying them up. They are doing this in order to be rid of competition, to assure themselves a supply of hogs, and possibly for reasons related to the import quota fixed by England.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Iowa on the amendment has expired.

Mr. MURPHY. Then, I will speak on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 30 minutes on the bill.

Mr. MURPHY. The processing tax paid on hogs finances, dollar for dollar, the corn-hog benefits paid the producers of hogs. There is no drain on the Federal Treasury from this tax. A glance at the financial statements of the big packers for last year discloses that they made very much money. They do not pass on the processing tax. It is my conclusion, stated on the floor here long ago, that in the first instance the processing tax on hogs was taken out of the producer. That view was expressed also by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and by my colleague from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON]. On April 2, 1934, my colleague said this:

> With reference to the Iowa situation, the processing tax has been imposed upon hogs. What has happened to the price of hogs? It went down just as fast as the processing tax was put on.

One year later, 1935, my Iowa colleague said:

> I think there is no question but that both (producer and consumer) are contributing to the processing tax. I do not believe there is any yardstick by which to measure accurately the relative proportions. I think originally the producer paid more than he is now paying because as this matter has been gradually adjusted, more of the tax has been reflected in the price charged the consumer. I think for that reason we find a decline in the price paid the producer and the tremendous advance in the price paid by the consumer.

It was clearly the thought of my Iowa colleague, as indicated by these quoted utterances, that so much of the processing tax on hogs as was not taken from the hog raiser in the lower price paid him for his hogs was taken from the consumer.

The meat packers do not absorb the processing tax, neither the big packers nor the little ones. They do not absorb it because it would be an impossibility for them to pay it. The total of processing taxes paid on hogs to the end of May 1935 was $254,315,586.89. For them to pay that tax would have resulted long ago in the bankruptcy of the meat-packing industry. They could not pay it and survive. I am stating facts of very general knowledge. I do not see how I could face my people, who know well that when they have not paid the tax as producers the consumer has paid it, with a record of having voted against this committee amendment and thereby to have opened the door to the meat packers and extended an invitation to them to use their fertile minds in an effort to get back for themselves processing taxes paid by them as agents of the producer and consumer. If I should go back to my people with a record such as that, with a record of having opened the door to a raid on the Treasury, a raid in defiance of and in contempt of all principles of justice and equity, they would relegate me to the oblivion which I should so richly deserve.

The Senator from Idaho not only said that the processing tax on hogs was not paid by the processor but was collected from the producer, but he also said that the man who bought the jute bag, not the manufacturer of that bag, paid the processing tax on jute.

What about the tax on wheat?

I have here a photostatic copy of a clipping from the Food Field Reporter, issue of July 15, 1935, which carries a statement by Henry Stude, president of the American Bakers Association. I invite special attention to the third and fourth sentences in paragraph 2, reading as follows:

> Therefore the baker should not refuse to pay the tax to the miller. If he declines to pay, the miller is fully justified in refusing to ship.

So here is a statement from the president of the American Bakers Association stating flatly, without any qualifications whatever, that the flour millers, who are now suing for recovery of taxes, are paid these taxes by the bakers. Moreover, the statement advises the bakers to keep right on paying the tax to the millers, regardless of the tax suits. The bakers, of course, pass the tax along to the consumers of bread.

I assert, Mr. President, that when Congress was considering the subject of processing taxes, it was very well understood that such taxes would be passed on to the consumer. The only element of surprise is that, in the case of perishable meat products, the processing taxes were taken out of the producer until such time as the demand for the products overtook supply, since which time the tax has been passed on to the consumer.

Every processor in this country was given notice that the tax would be imposed and that it was expected of him and viewed as entirely ethical of him to pass that tax on to the consumer.

I assert that the processor who did not pass on the tax in the goods he sold is an incompetent business man and a menace to his competitors.

I assert further, Mr. President, that when and if processing taxes shall ever be recovered by any of the industries which paid them, their difficulties still will remain.

It is not in controversy that since the founding of our Government the principle of the Government's immunity to suit has been maintained. The discussion here of that old principle of law, a principle as old as Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence, has occupied 4 or 5 hours of limited debate. The question of the reversal of that principle impends.

My mind is a layman's mind, and I have no skill in law. The discussion leaves me without adequate information. There has been no reference here to the doctrine of the citizen being estopped from instituting suit for damages against a political division of the Government, because he is a part of that Government. Permission granted to institute such suit, I have been advised, would end in the destruction of the Government. I should like to have heard discussion of that matter at length by the lawyers.

After consideration occupying only a few hours, this body is about to throw aside a doctrine as old, as I have said, as our Government.

This Chamber, which has echoed with counsel not to disregard the warnings of the fathers of the country and of the other great men who have preceded us here, and with appeals to weigh long and deliberately every proposal of departure from old principles, has rung in the debate with no such voice. I have not once heard the name of Washington, Jefferson, and Jackson, of Webster, Calhoun, or Clay, as advocates of the doctrine of the opponents of the committee amendment. None of them advocated abandonment of the principle which will be rejected if the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia shall be adopted.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. MURPHY. I yield.

Mr. BAILEY. I think the Senator is under some misapprehension about our position as a national policy. The Government has provided in a great many cases and in a very broad field the means whereby citizens may sue and recover. Let me invite his attention to the fact that in all cases of taxation the citizen has the right to file a claim for refund, and, after waiting 6 months, if the claim is refused he has the right to sue.

In cases of claims against the United States we have a fixed policy, as evidenced by the establishment of the Court of Claims; and in the Congress of the United States rarely does a week pass but that we recognize the moral obligation of granting the right to sue and recover. That is done through the Committee on Claims in the form of bill after bill, jurisdictional bills.

So the argument that we are advocating abandonment of the policy cannot stand at all in the light of the facts.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield?

Mr. MURPHY. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I suggest to my colleague on the committee, the Senator from Iowa, in answer to the statement by the Senator from North Carolina, that the right to sue the Government is a limited one. The argument made here that it should at all times prevail has never prevailed and does not now prevail.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator tell me wherein it has been limited with respect to the recovery of taxes paid?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I did not say it had been limited with respect to taxes.

Mr. BAILEY. That is what we are talking about.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; but there is no reason, because it has been granted uniformly on one subject, to say it is a violation of a proper system of government to limit it on others. I point out to my friend that Congress must delegate that power, must grant the power and the right to sue the Government in any instance before the right exists, and also it has at all times the right to withdraw any such jurisdiction of the court.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator just conceded that it is and long has been the fixed policy of the Government to allow a taxpayer, having paid his taxes, to go into the courts and test the righteousness of the tax, its amount, its validity, and every other aspect of it. The committee amendment negatives that right, and the substitute merely accords with the fixed policy with regard to taxes.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, I gather from the debate to which I have listened, and from such information as I have been able to gain otherwise, that the principle of the Government's immunity to suits is well established and that the only circumstances under which that right is now sought to be waived is a claimed circumstance that the tax was paid by the processor. I have been at some pains to establish from the facts submitted that not one scintilla of proof has been submitted here that any taxpayer has himself absorbed the tax. I am not in favor now, on a showing of that kind, of opening the doors to suits for recovery.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MURPHY. May I inquire how much time I have?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has 17 minutes remaining.

Mr. MURPHY. I have ample time, so I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WAGNER. What is difficult for me to understand, in view of the argument of the Senator from Iowa, is that this very bill seems to recognize a distinction which I cannot comprehend between the taxpayer who has paid the tax and the taxpayer who may be required to pay the tax under the pending bill.

Mr. MURPHY. I will say to the Senator in reply to his query that as to the tax already paid we are in the position of validating the act of our agents. As to the tax to be imposed in the future, we are extending the right to recover.

Mr. WAGNER. But in simple language, whatever technical distinction the Senator may make, it simply means that the taxpayer who has paid the tax under the original act, even though eventually that act may be declared to be unconstitutional and the tax held to be illegally exacted, has no remedy at all to recover even though he may be able to establish to the satisfaction of the court that he himself absorbed the tax. Yet the taxpayer who may pay the tax under the pending bill, if it should become a law, and later should be declared to be unconstitutional, is told that he is going to be treated as a favored taxpayer; that he may go into court, and, if he can show that he absorbed the tax himself, he may have the right to recover. It is a distinction I cannot comprehend, and I believe it is an injustice to the taxpayer of the past. I should like an explanation of that distinction.

Mr. MURPHY. The revenues in the form of processing taxes have been collected, as we contend and as few deny, from either the consumers or the producers of the goods. There is no recognition in my mind of any equitable claim on the part of the processor to recover such taxes.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield to me and take it out of my time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will say to the Senator from New York that he cannot yield his time in that way.

Mr. WAGNER. Very well; I shall not take the time of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, I am impressed that we are proceeding in unseemly haste, without that due deliberation and debate which those of our people who cherish our past as safeguarding justice and conserving national morality would enjoin upon us were they informed regarding what it is we meditate.

It appears to me, Mr. President, that the courts should not be opened to question the raising of money or its appropriation by Congress except upon the constitutional ground that the tax is not uniform. That objection has not been raised here. Throughout the history of this country it has been the view of statesmen and the Supreme Court itself that Congress and the Executive are the sole judges of the necessity for a tax and the purposes for which it should be expended.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question at that point?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. MURPHY. I yield.

Mr. BAILEY. Then the Senator is prepared to contend that the power of Congress to tax should never be challenged in any court, but that we should exercise unlimited power regardless of the Constitution?

Mr. MURPHY. I shall quote on that subject something from President Monroe, whose utterances may be considered as carrying much more weight than mine.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MURPHY. I yield.

Mr. GORE. The Senator said that the tax ought not to be challenged except on the ground of uniformity. The newspapers report the decision of the United States circuit court of appeals in Boston a few days ago, stating that the court held that if the processing tax be a direct tax, then it is void because it is not based on the rule of apportionment; if the processing tax be an indirect tax, be an excise tax, then it is void because it does not observe the rule of uniformity. Taking either horn of the dilemma, the tax is a void tax. Would the Senator close the courts against that sort of contention?

Mr. MURPHY. Lest I may not finish before the expiration of my time, if the Senator will indulge me, I should like to proceed with this statement from President Monroe. I am asserting that throughout the history of the country it has been the view of statesmen and of the Supreme Court itself that Congress and the Executive are the sole judges of the necessity for a tax and the purposes for which it should be expended.

President Monroe said, in his message to the Seventeenth Congress:

> It was evidently impossible to have subjected this grant, in either branch, to such restriction, without exposing the Government to very serious embarrassment. * * * Had the Supreme Court been authorized, or should any other tribunal, distinct from the Government be authorized, to impose its veto, and to say that more money had been raised under either branch of this power, that is, by taxes, duties, imposts, or excises, than was necessary; that such a tax or duty was useless; that the appropriation to this or that purpose was constitutional—the movement might have been suspended, and the whole system disorganized. It was impossible to have created a power within the Government, or any other power, distinct from Congress and the Executive, which should control the movement of the Government in this respect and not destroy it.

Mr. President, I am impressed that the attack on this committee amendment is an attack on the processing tax itself. To my mind, the effect of this attack is to discredit the Agricultural Adjustment Act. As I view it, we would be more frank if we should refuse altogether to adopt these amendments than to attack the whole program by an indirect method.

The effort here is to make the Federal Treasury bail out an inefficient and overexpanded industry, the cotton-textile industry. Moreover, we are in the attitude of urging the processors to sue the Government, and commending the plaintiffs to the favorable consideration of the courts. We are throwing open the doors of the Treasury to the processors, with an invitation to raid it. We are saying to these special interests, "Here is the $900,000,000 you paid; come and get it."

Mr. President, possibly I am too sophisticated; possibly I am too cynical; but I have had to find my way around, and so far I have escaped being run down by the cars. When the lawyers and the accountants whom the processors engage for the job begin to operate, the income-tax refunds made in the Harding administration will look like 30 cents.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. MURPHY. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. Has the Senator any means of estimating the number of lawsuits this so-called "compromise amendment" will invite and provoke?

Mr. MURPHY. I made an effort to ascertain how many there could be, but I was unable, in the very limited time given me, to ascertain; but it is a stupendous number, I think.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, may I undertake to throw a little light on that inquiry?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. MURPHY. I do.

Mr. BAILEY. The very fact that this proposed legislation makes a distinction between past taxes and future taxes has probably notified everyone in America to enter his suit; and I think the number, as stated in the newspapers, is about 300. I think that is a fair estimate of the number.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I think the Senator from North Carolina has greatly underestimated the number. If the Senator from Iowa will permit me just a brief statement——

Mr. MURPHY. Certainly; I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. The vice in the compromise amendment is not in its form. In theory it is fair, but in practical result it will invite everyone who has paid the processing tax to enter proceedings against the Government for its recovery; and those who actually have passed it on, particularly including the large taxpayers, may be in the best position to establish their claim. If they should swear that they had not passed on the tax, it would be difficult for any lawyer to establish the contrary or to overcome the presumption which would arise from the simple assertion of the fact that the tax had not been passed on.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. MURPHY. I decline to yield for the moment until the Senator from Arkansas shall have concluded.

Mr. ROBINSON. It will be found that all the big claimants will attempt to recover their claims, and the little claimants will not be able to establish their claims. The big claimants have already passed the tax on to the consumer or turned it back to the producer. As I showed yesterday, that was admitted in a number of public addresses by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. No Senator has been able to show where the original payer of the tax has not passed it on to the consumer.

Mr. MURPHY. Before the Senator from Arkansas takes his seat I will say that my office has just transmitted to me the information he sought to elicit from me. There were 900,000 floor-stock-tax payers and 49,000 processing-tax payers. The invitation is to all of them—a total of 949,000—to "come in and get it."

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa further yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. MURPHY. I do.

Mr. ROBINSON. I thank the Senator.

The adoption of this amendment, then, will hail the dawn of a glorious day for the lawyers. It will probably induce thousands of lawsuits.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. MURPHY. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand, this amendment as it is now proposed——

Mr. MURPHY. Will the Senator indulge me for a moment, until I inquire how much time I have left?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 5 minutes left.

Mr. BORAH. Then I will not interrupt the Senator.

Mr. MURPHY. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I will not interrupt.

Mr. MURPHY. I am very happy to have the Senator interrupt, because it will require only a sentence or two to complete my remarks.

Mr. BORAH. I was about to say that with the safeguards thrown about this amendment as it is now proposed it would be impossible for those to recover who some Senators are afraid may recover. The burden is upon them to prove that they have not passed on the tax or that they have not sent it back to the producer.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa permit a further interruption?

Mr. MURPHY. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. When a claimant swears that he has not passed on the tax, how will it be possible to establish the contrary? And if he asserts a claim, he will be certain to give that evidence.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, if the opposition to this amendment is based upon the assumption that taxpayers will go into court and commit perjury——

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I have not the slightest doubt that as a result of the adoption of this amendment there will be many instances in which fraudulent or bogus claims will be presented.

Mr. BORAH. And with all the power and all the agents and all the capacity of the Government to uncover that class of men, they would land in the penitentiary instead of getting a judgment.

Mr. MURPHY. I will say to the Senator from Idaho that I have great respect for the human mind, and its fertile resources can hardly be imagined.

Mr. BORAH. If that argument be good, we should close the courts entirely.

Mr. MURPHY. I will say to the Senator from Idaho that the reference is not to the courts.

In conclusion, permit me to state——

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield just once more?

Mr. MURPHY. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. I desire to reiterate that the Senator from Iowa does not express the same apprehension about the taxpayer who is going to pay taxes in the future. He is quite willing to take the chance that he is not to recover unless he shows that he absorbed the tax; but there seems to be something about the past which differentiates it from the future in that respect.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. MURPHY. I must decline to yield, Mr. President. I desire to conclude my statement.

We ought clearly to understand what we are doing here. We are attacking the A. A. A. from the rear, stabbing it in the back, wrecking the agricultural program which has raised prices to producers in fulfillment of a promise made them when we sought their votes. We ought to understand that we are doing this to make special interests the beneficiaries of our act.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, during the address of the able Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], with his permission, I interrupted to say that I did not see any decided similarity between the instant case and the so-called "gold-clause securities bill." Subsequently thereto, the able Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] called my attention to the fact that if I should examine further, he thought I would be convinced that there is some similarity.

I undoubtedly overspoke myself when I said that there is no similarity, because there is some. What I intended to say was that, in my opinion, there is no unconstitutional feature about the so-called "gold-clause bill"; but I think now, and always have thought, that the processing tax was void, and that the courts would so hold. That makes a distinction. I am asked to vote for a tax which I believe to be beyond the power of Congress to lay or collect, and then I am asked to vote to prohibit the courts from inquiring into that which I believe to be unconstitutional. Sir, I cannot do it.

I am not assaulting the processing tax of the A. A. A. from the rear, but from the front.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I desire to remind the Senator that the Supreme Court has held that it was unconstitutional for us to revalue the dollar insofar as it affected the Government's obligation in the gold-clause bonds.

Mr. ASHURST. I am aware of that. I have listened to almost every word of this debate. This is a debate worthy of the Senate.

The reason why I have not participated in it to the extent I should have liked to do is that I have not the learning or the capacity to debate the question as would be becoming here, as I am not a member of the committee. I have listened with patience and with instruction to the speeches made; the speech of the able Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and the brilliant address which the able Senator from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY] has just concluded.

I am not what may be denominated "a man searching with a microscope to find unconstitutionalities" and ways of avoiding laws which Congress wishes to pass. This is one of the few times when I have been invited to walk up and vote for a tax beyond the power of Congress to lay.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate long. I am very much astonished that my good friend the Senator from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY] should make remarks here calculated to reflect upon the motives of his colleagues and equals. The suggestion that, because men are earnestly advocating that a taxpayer shall have the right to test the constitutionality of a tax imposed upon him, they are representing special interest does not require answer, and it is not worthy of condemnation.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. MURPHY. I should be far from imputing any unworthy motives to the Senator from North Carolina, for whom I have great respect. I thought I made clear that the effect of the action that might be taken here would be what I suggested.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if he desires to except only the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. MURPHY. By no means. I extend the remark whole-heartedly also to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I think the sentiment of the Senator from Iowa should be extended to every Senator here.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if this is to be an experience meeting, I want to get in on it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator wishes to treat this with humor, I will suggest that if he wishes to get in on the experience meeting, the proper thing for him to do is to come to the mourner's bench and confess his sins.

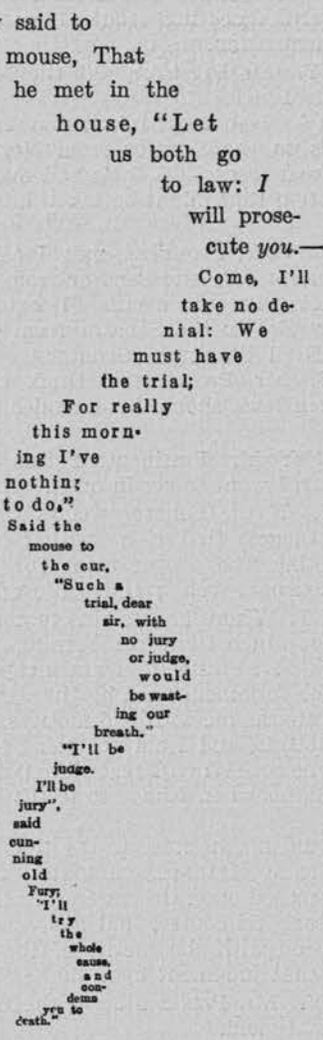
Mr. BARKLEY. There are no sins to confess and I have done nothing for which I am in mourning.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I am incapable of disavowing things of the sort mentioned by the Senator from Iowa. If men wish to charge me with bad motives, they can charge me with bad motives, and I am not going to defend myself. I never have done so. When I reach the point in the Senate of the United States when I have to testify to my character, I will get out.

The Senator did not hesitate to say that those of us who advocated the right of taxpayers to test the constitutionality of a tax imposed upon them were attacking the A. A. A. bill from the rear. Of course, that is special pleading; that has nothing to do with the merits of the question. Why should he pass that judgment upon me?

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.



Mr. MURPHY. I have in mind that within the last few weeks, if the Senator please, some 140 suits have been instituted, almost simultaneously, attacking the constitutionality of the A. A. A. Act. It was that I had in mind, not any conspiracy on the part of the Senator from North Carolina, the Senator from Georgia, or other Members of this body.

Mr. BAILEY. I accept very freely what the Senator says. I shall not get into any quarrel with him; I have not the slightest idea of doing anything of that sort. But if he had said that, it would have relieved me of something of a sense of necessity of doing a thing rather disagreeable. He just said that he interpreted these court proceedings as attacks. I think we might have understood that; but, even so, I question whether a man in the Senate of the United States has the right to use this arena to pillory the humblest man who ever lived when he undertakes to assert his rights in a court of law.

There is no superiority here, and I abhor, I hate, I despise, a course of procedure which uses this arena to call in question the character of the President of the United States, as has been repeatedly done. But, defending the President against that sort of thing, I will equally defend the humblest Negro in North Carolina against that sort of thing. This is a country of equals. There is no class, there is no office or official station.

Mr. President, all I have done—and I shall continue to do it—is to urge that the constitutional rights of human beings in the United States shall be preserved and shall be respected.

I listened to the speech of the Senator with a very great deal of interest, and it brought to my mind Alice in Wonderland. I think I will read a little, entitled "The Mouse's Tail", from page 50 of Alice in Wonderland. It is a sufficient commentary on his argument:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, as modified, to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted on page 61, line 15, to line 12, page 62, it is proposed to insert the following:

(d) No recovery, recoupment, set-off, refund, or credit shall be made or allowed of, nor shall any counterclaim be allowed for any amount of any tax, penalty, or interest which accrued before, on, or after the date of the adoption of this amendment under this title (including any overpayment of such tax), unless the claimant establishes to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, or in the case of a judicial proceeding establishes in such proceeding (1) that he has not included such amount in the price of the article with respect to which it was imposed or of any article processed from the commodity with respect to which it was imposed, that he has not collected from the vendee any part of such amount, and that the price paid to the producer was not reduced by any part of such amount, or (2) that he has repaid such amount to the ultimate purchaser of the article, or in case the price paid to the producer was reduced by such amount, to such producer; nor shall any judgment or decree be entered by any Federal or State court for damages for the collection thereof, unless the claimant establishes the foregoing facts, in (1) or (2) as the case may be, in addition to all other facts required to be established. The provisions of this subsection shall not apply to any refund or credit under subsection (a) or (c) of section 15, section 16, or section 17 of this title, or to any refund or credit to the processor of any tax paid by him with respect to articles exported pursuant to the provisions of section 317 of the Tariff Act of 1930.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. CONNALLY. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SHEPPARD] is detained by important business. I should like this announcement to stand for all votes today.

Mr. ROBINSON. I wish to announce that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN], the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH], the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], and the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] are unavoidably detained from the Senate.

I wish further to announce that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] and the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] are detained in committee meetings. I am informed that the Senator from Arizona would vote "nay" if he were present.

I wish also to announce that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE] is detained on departmental matters. I am advised that if present he would vote "yea."

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce the necessary absence of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS], who is paired with the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] on this question. If present, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] would vote "yea", and the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 61, nays 23, as follows:

So Mr. GEORGE's amendment, as modified, to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now recurs on the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, what subsection is that?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the amendment just agreed to was the one beginning in line 15, on page 61.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, has the amendment on page 61 been finally disposed of?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair's understanding is that the amendment which previously had been adopted was reconsidered by unanimous consent for the purpose of allowing the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] to offer an amendment to it. The amendment of the Senator from Georgia to the committee amendment has just been agreed to. The question now recurs on the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. GEORGE. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. GEORGE. Was the vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to restricted to subsection (d)?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The entire amendment, beginning in line 21, on page 60, was reconsidered.

Mr. GEORGE. The entire amendment was reconsidered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The entire amendment was reconsidered by unanimous consent.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, before the final vote is taken may I call the Senate's attention to subsection (f) on page 63?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Georgia that subsection (f) is not included in the committee amendment. The committee amendment is from line 21, on page 60, through line 12, on page 62.

Mr. GEORGE. The Chair is entirely correct, but subsection (f) is also a part of this same general section, and if the vote by which the entire section was agreed to was reconsidered, then this subsection (f) necessarily was included.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Georgia that, as the Chair understands, the reconsideration applies to the committee amendment beginning in line 21, page 60, and extending through line 12, on page 62.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I do not think there will be any controversy about it. Section (f) contains language which is slightly inconsistent with the language which has now been inserted; that is to say, the language in parentheses in subsection (f) on page 63, beginning in line 14—

(and, in case any part or application of subsection (a) of this section is held invalid, which may have heretofore accrued)—

That makes applicable section 3226 of the Revised Statutes, which, among other things, contains limitation upon the time within which any refund may be claimed, and since now the right of recovery is given to the taxpayer under the existing law and that right will be given the taxpayer who may be affected by the amendatory act after its passage, I am sure the author of the bill will agree that this language ought to be modified, and nothing is necessary except to strike out the language in parentheses beginning in line 14, on page 63—

(and, in case any part or application of subsection (a) of this section is held invalid, which may have heretofore accrued)——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senate has not completed action on this amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. That is true. The Senator is entirely correct in that statement.

Mr. NORRIS. We ought to vote on the committee amendment, as amended.

Mr. GEORGE. My first inquiry related to just how far the unanimous consent to reconsider extended, and if it extended to and included subsection (f) I was going to move an amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. That would be all right, but if we are to proceed in orderly fashion it seems to me we ought to vote now on the amendment, as amended.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator is entirely correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the committee amendment, as amended.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, did the Senator from Georgia insert the language to which I called attention yesterday?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, Mr. President; that is inserted in the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the committee amendment, as amended.

The committee amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, while I know the parliamentary situation is not clear, I ask unanimous consent that the language which I have read, beginning with the parenthesis on page 63, line 14—

(and, in case any part or application of subsection (a) of this section is held invalid, which may have heretofore accrued)— be stricken out so that the same statutory period of limitation will apply to those who claim any refund, both under the existing law and under the act, as amended.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I am in accord with what the Senator is trying to do, but it seems to me that before we vote to strike out that language we ought to dispose of the committee amendment, on pages 57 and 58. The amendment begins on page 57 and ends on page 58. Having adopted the amendment on page 61, as amended, to be consistent, we ought now to dispose of the amendment on page 58, and, in order to be consistent, the committee amendment should be disagreed to.

Mr. SMITH. Yes. That would begin in line 22, page 57.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment was passed over by unanimous consent, and any time any Senator demands the regular order, that amendment is the regular order.

Mr. SMITH. I demand the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the committee amendment, beginning in line 22, page 57, to and including line 5 on page 59.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, while the vote just taken did not directly involve the provisions in this section, I still recognize that indirectly it was involved. I think the Senate vote is decisive on the issue, and I have no purpose of making further insistence by way of argument on this committee amendment. I shall ask for the yeas and nays on the committee amendment.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, it seems to me that that amendment should be divided in some way. The committee amendment strikes out the permission to bring suit and then adds other language. If we agree to the committee amendment, then we strike out the permission to bring suit. If we disagree to the committee amendment, then we put into force and effect the House language prohibiting the bringing of suit.

Mr. BORAH. The two go together.

Mr. PITTMAN. That amendment must be separated in some way.

Mr. BARKLEY. To reject the committee amendment will restore the language of the House bill stricken out by the committee. It will then be necessary, if that language is to be eliminated, to move to strike it out, because merely to reject the committee amendment restores the language adopted by the House.

Mr. NORRIS. According to the procedure under which we are operating, that question will come after the disposition of the committee amendments.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; that is true.

Mr. NORRIS. A motion will very likely be made by the chairman of the committee to strike out the House language commencing on line 22, which would be restored, it is true, if the Senate rejects the committee amendment. I do not see any other parliamentary way to accomplish that end.

Mr. BORAH. The first step to take would be to reject the committee amendment on page 58.

Mr. NORRIS. That is correct. But the committee amendment on page 58 strikes out the House language and inserts new language. The rejection of that amendment would have the effect of striking out the language of the committee amendment, but it would likewise have the effect of restoring the House language which we desire to strike out, and that would have to be done, when we get through the committee amendments, by striking out the House text.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is not the question to strike out and insert divisible?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Texas that the understanding of the Chair is that if the committee amendment beginning on line 3, page 58, and running to line 15, on page 61, be rejected, it would have the effect of restoring the language of the House bill.

Mr. CONNALLY. The point I make is that the motion to strike out and insert is divisible.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that, under the Senate rules, a motion to strike out and insert is not divisible, a specific exemption being made.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, it may be done by unanimous consent, and I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendment may be divided so that a vote may first be taken on the amendment of the committee to strike out the language beginning in line 22, page 57, and ending with a period on line 3, page 58, and that then a vote may be taken upon the text which the committee proposes to insert.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to call attention to the fact that if the committee amendment beginning on line 22, page 57, down to the beginning of the italics in line 3, page 58, shall be disagreed to, we will have agreed substantially to the same language that is in italics.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator misunderstood my request. I simply asked that the Senate have a right to vote upon the amendment of the committee in two parts; first, on the committee amendment to strike out, and then take a vote on the amendment to insert that portion of the amendment which is printed in italics. If the Senate will permit that to be done, then we may vote for the amendment of the committee to strike out the language, and we may vote to reject the portion which the committee have moved to insert, and the matter will be settled.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that a vote first be taken on the motion to strike out the language beginning in line 22, page 57, and extending through line 3, on page 58, and that thereafter a vote be taken on the committee amendment to insert. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The question is on the amendment to strike out the language of the House bill beginning on line 22, page 57.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the committee amendment beginning in line 3, page 58, and extending through line 15.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On that question the Senator from Alabama demands the yeas and nays. Is there a second?

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, there is another amendment in this subsection which, I believe, begins in line 1, page 59, but it is a part of the same subsection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's statement is correct.

Mr. GEORGE. We are simply proceeding here by piecemeal. That identical provision has been incorporated in the amendment which has already been adopted.

Mr. SMITH. To what does the Senator from Georgia refer?

Mr. GEORGE. To the Senate committee amendment at the top of page 59 in subsection (a).

Mr. SMITH. May I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that, beginning with line 16, page 58, the compromise amendment which has been adopted in lieu of the committee amendment involves all the House text, and also the amendment to which the Senator refers?

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator from South Carolina is entirely correct; and in order to carry out really what the Senate has done there ought to be unanimous consent now asked and given by the chairman, it seems to me, to consider all of subsection (a), so that we may dispose of it while we are on it.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that in section 21 (a), which we have modified by the action just taken down to line 15, inclusive, on page 58, the Senate now vote on that part of the section beginning in line 16, page 58, down to line 5, on page 59, inclusive.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator from South Carolina, I understand, asks unanimous consent that the Senate may now vote upon that?

Mr. SMITH. That the Senate may now vote upon that.

Mr. GEORGE. Then, Mr. President, I move that that be stricken, because it is covered already by the substitute amendment which has been adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that the language beginning with line 16, page 58, and extending to line 5, page 59, be treated as one matter. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia to strike out the language as mentioned embraced within the lines and pages stated.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMAN obtained the floor.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. TRUMAN. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. There is matter on page 60 which will have to be reconsidered; but, in view of the fact that it is not a committee amendment, I presume it will come later when individual amendments may be offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the unanimous-consent agreement individual amendments will not be in order until after committee amendments shall have been disposed of.

Mr. TRUMAN. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. GUFFEY], proposing to strike out the word "barley" from the committee amendment on page 38, line 4, was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Missouri that before there can be a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania was rejected it will be necessary to make a motion to reconsider the vote by which the committee amendment was adopted.

Mr. TRUMAN. Very well; I make that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri to reconsider the vote by which the amendment at the top of page 38, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. GUFFEY] was discussed briefly prior to a vote being taken on it a day or two ago. The only excuse for striking barley from the bill is in the interest of the brewers of the country. Of course, it is true that quite a percentage of barley goes into the manufacture of beer. I made the statement on the floor that, according to the figures given to me by a man who claimed to know what he was talking about, that only 5 pounds of barley are used in the making of a barrel of 31 gallons of beer.

Five pounds of barley at the present price would be worth less than 5 cents, about 2½ cents, and if a 25-cent processing tax should be placed on barley it would be worth about a cent a pound. That would make 5 cents' worth of barley in a barrel of beer. So, Mr. President, there is little excuse for striking barley from the provisions of the bill.

If barley should remain in the bill, and the Secretary of Agriculture should see fit to carry out the provision and apply the processing tax, it would mean that the farmers who grow barley will get a part of the processing tax of 25 cents per bushel on the quantity that is used in the brewing of beer or ground into flour. Only a very small portion of the barley is ground into flour, but quite a large percentage goes into the manufacture of beer. The farmers would get the benefit from the processing tax. The benefit would not amount to 25 cents a bushel to the farmer, but only a portion of that; I do not know exactly how much, but probably 10 or 15 cents. However, what little benefit would accrue to the farmer would help him that much. An increase of 5 cents on a barrel of beer would amount to little in the wholesale price of the beer and amount to less to the consumer who buys beer by the bottle or glass.

It seems to me a rather small proposition, in order to benefit brewers 5 cents on a barrel of beer, to strike out barley, the inclusion of which is designed for the benefit of the farmers who produce barley in this country and who are selling it below cost of production, the price being down to 25 cents a bushel at the present time. If the Senate wants to vote that way, of course, it is entitled to do so.

Mr. President, there have been some votes taken on this measure which seem to me to indicate that a majority of the Senate are not in favor of doing anything for the farmers or trying to do anything for the farmers, but do want to do something for the wholesalers and manufacturers, and now for the brewers of beer. In the case of a 31-gallon barrel of beer, the barley for which costs them less than 5 cents, they want to prevent a small processing tax being placed on barley for fear that there might be an increase of a cent or two more on a barrel of beer.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know who made the motion to reconsider, and I am asking the Chair if the motion to reconsider was made by a Senator who is qualified under the rule to make it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the motion was made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN].

Mr. TRUMAN. Mr. President, I will say that I voted against the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania to the amendment of the committee, and that I voted for the committee amendment, as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri states that he voted for the committee amendment, as amended, and against the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, which was rejected.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the purpose of this bill. The purpose of the bill is to remove the handicap placed upon producers of farm products. The special privilege which industry has enjoyed since the Civil War in the protective tariff has undoubtedly had as much to do with the concentration of wealth in the hands of a few, and with monopolistic practices and monopolistic prices, as has any policy pursued by the American Government. That is a special-privilege policy which is un-American. Every political party of the country in fine phrases has protested against such special privileges and pledged a guaranty of his full rights to every citizen.

The purpose of the bill is to give to the farmer a sufficient equalizing privilege with industrial life of America to remove the handicaps placed upon him.

The Paint Trust of the United States was able to take the flax farmer out of the bill for the benefit of industry. And now the brewing industry, an industry which has enjoyed not only prosperity but great privileges, is endeavoring to make the farmer furnish the raw material for less than cost of production. Such a proposal is antagonistic to every purpose of the agricultural policy upon which the bill is founded. If we are going to give protection to every farmer of the country, why discriminate against the barley farmer and the flax farmer? We have already taken the flax farmer out of the bill. Are we going to take the barley farmer out of the bill for the benefit of the industry which uses the raw material?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to say just a word about the parliamentary situation as I see it. This is a motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment in lines 1 to 13, page 38, of the bill was adopted. That is the amendment which includes barley and other commodities. If the motion prevails and we reconsider the vote by which we adopted the amendment, it will immediately be followed by a motion to reconsider the vote by which barley was retained in the amendment. If that motion shall be carried, then we will vote on a motion to strike out barley. If we are opposed to striking out barley we can settle the whole question now by voting against reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment was adopted.

That is the parliamentary situation, and the real test before the Senate is whether we want barley in or whether we want barley out. Believing as I do that barley ought to stay in the bill I am opposed to the motion to reconsider.

While I do not want to reargue the question of barley, yet when we come to settle the question of leaving barley in or taking barley out, we have, on the one hand, the interest of the barley farmers, who number many and who want to get a higher price for their barley, and, on the other hand, we have the brewer who uses most of the barley and who wants to buy his barley as cheaply as he can in order that the rest of us may pay a little less for our beer if he passes the saving on to us.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. LONG. Has the Senator no sympathy for the poor beer drinker? [Laughter.]

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I have great sympathy in this weather for the poor beer drinker, but the beer drinker ought to be able, it seems to me, to pay a price for his beer that would enable the farmer, who produces the barley, to obtain a reasonable price for his barley.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. How much more would he have to pay for a glass of beer if barley were kept in the bill than if it were taken out? The Senator from Nebraska is a recognized expert on this question! [Laughter.]

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; and I heard it said all around the Chamber the other day, when we voted on the barley amendment, that if we wanted 5-cent beer we would have to take barley out of the bill. I do not know enough about it to know how much real profit is in a glass of beer, or whether it would have that effect, but the contest now is, as I see it, between the farmer who produces barley and the brewer who makes the beer.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, what has the existing state of the weather to do with that proposition? [Laughter.]

Mr. NORRIS. I have understood from talking with a great many men, like the Senator from Virginia, of very wide experience, that they drink more beer in hot weather than they do in cold weather. [Laughter.]

Mr. GLASS. I, who never drank it in either hot or cold weather, have always noted that in hot weather they drink it to get cool and in cold weather they drink it to get hot. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POPE in the chair). The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN] to reconsider the vote by which the committee amendment, as amended, on page 38, lines 1 to 13, was adopted.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. SMITH. The question is whether we shall reconsider?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is whether the Senate will reconsider the vote by which it adopted the committee amendment, as amended, on page 38, lines 1 to 13, both inclusive.

Mr. FRAZIER. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk called the roll.

Mr. McKELLAR (after having voted in the negative). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce the necessary absence of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], who are paired on this question. If present, the Senator from Delaware would vote "yea", and the Senator from South Carolina would vote "nay."

Mr. CONNALLY. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SHEPPARD] is detained by important business. I should like this announcement to stand for all votes today.

Mr. LEWIS. I announce the absence for the day of my colleague [Mr. DIETERICH].

I also wish to announce that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DUFFY], and the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] are detained in an important committee meeting.

I wish further to announce that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] are unavoidably detained from the Senate.

So Mr. TRUMAN'S motion to reconsider was rejected.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, in accordance with the amendments already adopted there should be inserted in line 13, page 63, after the word "accrued", the word "before" to make the amendment conform to the action of the Senate in other sections.

Also, in order to conform to the action of the Senate, we should strike out all between the parentheses in line 14, page 63, beginning after the word "amendment", and going down to and including the word "accrued", in line 16.

I ask that the amendment on page 63 be amended by inserting, after the word "accrued", in line 13, the word "before."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SMITH. Then I ask that all between the parentheses on the lines indicated—lines 14, 15, and 16—be also eliminated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am under compulsion to leave the Chamber within a few minutes in order to keep an imperative engagement which will prevent me from being here tomorrow. Therefore I am about to ask for the adoption of two amendments which I think are in order because of the fact that we have held over the matter of milk.

On page 19, line 18, I think it was agreed that after the word "agencies" there should be inserted the words "(which, in the case of milk, shall be a market administrator)." I think that was agreed to as being a proper amendment to be offered at the right time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New York?

Mr. SMITH. What line is that?

Mr. COPELAND. Line 18, page 19, after the word "agencies."

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, I think we should have an audible discussion of this proposal. What is it all about?

Mr. COPELAND. I will say to the Senator from Oregon that the other day when we discussed the matter of milk I apparently obtained the approval of those in charge of the bill that at the right time, after the word "agencies", on line 18, page 19, there might be inserted the words "(which, in the case of milk, shall be a market administrator)." That is, if there were several cooperatives, the idea is that some rival cooperative should not be the administrator, but that there should be a market administrator, as provided for in other parts of the bill.

I think that was agreed to by those in charge of the bill as a reasonable request.

Mr. SMITH. The suggestion has been made, to carry out the purpose the Senator has in view, to insert, after the word "agencies", the words "(which, in the case of milk, shall not be a cooperative)."

Mr. COPELAND. That is all right. Is that better?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; because that specifically names the thing the Senator is trying to avoid.

Mr. COPELAND. Very well.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, it is impossible to hear what is being said.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the amendment which the Senator from New York proposes is on page 19, line 18, after the word "agencies", to insert the words "(which, in the case of milk, shall not be a cooperative)."

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the Senator explain what that means? I am unable to follow the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. SMITH. As I understand—the Senator from New York can explain the amendment, perhaps, better than can I—it simply means that a cooperative shall not be the agency for distributing milk within that territory.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the Senator tell me why not?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, in the section where I live, for example, in a given area there are several cooperatives, and it does not seem fair to the other cooperatives for one particular cooperative to be the administrator of this provision.

The suggestion which I first made was that after the word "agencies" there should be inserted the words "which in the case of milk shall be a market administrator", but now the chairman of the committee suggests that instead of saying that, it shall be provided that the agency shall not be a cooperative. That is entirely satisfactory to me, and I think it would be to every cooperative in my State. The idea is that one cooperative should not have advantage over the other cooperatives in the same field by being made administrator.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, it seems to me this is just another move by the present handlers to control the market of milk. Of course, they do not want the cooperatives to have anything to do with its handling and selling. The pending bill is for the benefit of the producers of milk and not for the benefit of the handlers. The handlers make enough money at the present time. They make more money in handling the milk than the farmers do in producing it. Some of the dairy companies right here in Washington are owned by a holding company in New York, and the holding companies in New York get too much for handling milk now. Let the cooperatives have a chance.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I know that the Senator is very sincere about this matter, but let me say that the people about whom I am talking, the people who are interested in this matter, are the farmers themselves—the producers. There are a number of rival cooperatives in my State, and sometimes when the farmers are forced into one or the other they feel that advantage is taken of them.

My first choice was not to have one of the cooperative establishments at all chosen, but to have a market administrator appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, if any of the farmers around New York are so old-fashioned that they cannot cooperate one with the other, I have not much sympathy with them.

Mr. COPELAND. The trouble with them is that they cooperate so much that they have half a dozen cooperatives. They are so sensible that they have many cooperatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed after the word "agencies", in line 18 on page 19, to insert in parentheses the words "which in the case of milk shall not be a cooperative."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, would that bar cooperatives?

Mr. COPELAND. If the Senator will observe the language of the entire section, beginning on line 16, he will find that it reads, "Providing for the appointment or selection by the Secretary of Agriculture of a method for the appointment or selection, of an agency or agencies, and defining their powers and duties", and so forth.

I have tried to make clear that in my section of the country there are so many cooperatives, which sometimes are bitter rivals, that they are protesting, because there is provision made in other parts of the bill that the Secretary of Agriculture shall appoint a market administrator. The chairman of the committee suggests that instead of doing as I first suggested, make the agency a market administrator, it should be provided that it shall not be a cooperative, meaning that some neutral body outside of the several cooperatives should be chosen.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The Senator does not mean that a rival milk distributor, a corporation, a noncooperative corporation, could be appointed administrator?

Mr. COPELAND. There are a great many producer-distributors in our section. We have a number of cooperatives, and they are distressed over the idea of having one of those cooperatives made the administrator. I still believe that my original plan is a better one, not to say that it should not be a cooperative, because there might be a section where a cooperative would be the best choice, but that it should be left to the Secretary of Agriculture in choosing an agency so that he might appoint a market administrator. I still believe my first suggestion was better, that in the case of milk the agency should be a market administrator appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, may we have the amendment stated? I did not hear it, in the confusion.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, certain language was left out of the proposed amendment about cooperatives, and I should like to have the clerk read it as it was intended to be offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the proposed amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, on page 19, line 18, after the word "agencies", to insert in parentheses the words "which in the case of milk shall not be a cooperative association of producers."

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. MURPHY. The words "market administrator" might prevent the Secretary, if he saw fit, from appointing a committee to control. That is the objection to the term "market administrator." The suggestion that a cooperative shall not be the administrator meets the objection the Senator advanced to cooperatives, or other agencies not cooperatives, and leaves the way open for the selection of a committee, if the Secretary should desire to appoint a committee. I see no objection to the amendment last suggested by the Senator.

Mr. COPELAND. I modify my amendment accordingly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New York, as modified.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, would any other distributor be barred from acting as administrator?

Mr. COPELAND. The language is: "shall not be a cooperative association of producers", as the chairman has presented the matter.

Mr. MURPHY. I will say to the Senator from Minnesota that the Secretary could appoint a member of a cooperative, but he could not appoint the cooperative itself as the agency.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That is another matter.

Mr. MURPHY. He could appoint a member of a cooperative as a member of a committee which should administer the provision.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That is a different matter.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, what is the final draft of the proposal?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the proposed amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 19, line 18, after the word "agencies", it is proposed to insert in parenthesis the words "which in the case of milk shall not be a cooperative association of producers."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, there is one other matter I desire to bring up, if I may be permitted, relating to the provision on page 40, line 18. I suppose every Senator has received letters from his constituents stating that the greatest thing this country needs is a 5-cent cigar, and that that is endangered by the wording of the proposed law, because, according to the testimony of the manufacturers, the 5-cent cigar and other cigars are really made of assembled tobacco produced in different States and different sections. In most States and most sections the price of tobacco is now above parity, and under the bill as it is written it is feared there would be a still further tax upon tobacco, which is quite unnecessary, in view of the fact that it is already 35 percent above parity in comparison with an index number of 100.

I am proposing that on page 40, line 18, after the word "exceeds", there shall be deleted the words "by 20 percent or less"; at the end of line 19, that there shall be deleted the words "rate of such"; in line 20, that the word "reduced" be changed to "abolished" and the comma stricken out; that a period be placed in line 21 after the word "year", and that the remainder of the language on that page and two lines on page 41 be deleted, so that it would read:

(B) If the average farm price of any commodity, the rate of tax on the processing of which is prescribed in paragraph (2), (3), (4), or (5) of this subsection, during the 2 months immediately preceding and the first 10 months of any marketing year—

(i) is equal to, or exceeds the fair exchange value thereof, the tax shall be abolished, at the beginning of the next succeeding marketing year.

I think that language is in accord with that suggested by the experts and others who have knowledge of the matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's amendment is to a committee amendment, which has been agreed to, and the vote will have to be reconsidered before the amendment to the amendment may be considered.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, at the time the tobacco matter was before the Senate I raised the question about tobacco, speaking particularly about the amendments to the present tobacco act in connection with the proposed amendments, and was assured that this matter could be brought up at the proper time. I am asking that it may be done now for the reason that I made a reservation in regard to it at the time, and for the reason also that I must leave the Senate Chamber within 12 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent that the vote by which the amendment appearing on page 40, line 18, and going through line 2 on page 41, be reconsidered. Is there objection?

Mr. FRAZIER. This is a very important provision of the bill, and one which the Department insisted on; and I object.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, has unanimous consent been obtained to reconsider the vote by which the committee amendment was adopted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POPE in the chair). Objection was heard.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. KING. My recollection is, as was stated by the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], that when this particular provision was under consideration the amendment was agreed to, with the understanding at the time that the adoption of the amendment would not preclude a motion to reconsider, because the Senator from New York intended to make that motion, as he has just indicated. So the amendment was agreed upon pro forma, with the understanding that there was a restriction; and the Senator is insisting, as

I understand, upon carrying out the understanding which was entered into.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I insist upon the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order has been asked for. The RECORD shows no agreement to reconsider the vote by which the Senate agreed to the amendment.

Mr. COPELAND. I appeal to the Senator from Wisconsin to——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I desire to accommodate the Senator from New York, but the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] has objected to the Senator's request for unanimous consent. We have spent 10 or 15 minutes on this matter, and if unanimous consent cannot be obtained, I desire to proceed. I have been waiting here for 3 days for an opportunity to offer an amendment to the bill.

Mr. COPELAND. Let me say to the Senator from Wisconsin that I do not think it is necessary to ask unanimous consent, because the RECORD will show that when this provision as to tobacco was up I asked that I might have the opportunity to offer this amendment. That request is in the RECORD. The Senator from Idaho nods his head in approval.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Chair has just ruled that there is nothing in the Senate's action to show that to be so, and from that, I take it, that the Chair holds that unanimous consent is necessary.

I wish to say to the Senator that the only reason why I asked for the regular order was that we should not, as we so often do in the Senate after some Senator has objected and the parliamentary situation is closed, proceed for an hour discussing a subject which under the rules may not be acted upon by the Senate.

If the Senator from New York can get unanimous consent and can proceed, I shall not demand the regular order; but I desire to have the Senate proceed with the regular order if the Senator from New York is estopped.

Mr. COPELAND. Then I appeal to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER]. I do not know whether or not the chairman of the committee is willing to accept my amendment. Will not the Senator from North Dakota withhold his objection for a moment until I can find out the attitude of the committee?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I think this language has been worked out in conjunction with the buyers of tobacco in the sections to which the provision will apply. They have gone over it carefully. I think I can truthfully state that of all the provisions of the bill the ones relating to tobacco have been the most satisfactory to the buyers and the producers. I understand that together they have worked out this program, looking ultimately to the removal of the processing tax. I should not like the present set-up to be disturbed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, may I call the attention of the Senator from South Carolina to the fact that as I read this language it applies to all commodities. It is not confined to tobacco.

Mr. SMITH. I understand that, but this proposal was made by reason of the fact that tobacco is one commodity which has gone beyond parity.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understand that; but I wish to be clear about this matter. As I understand the amendment of the Senator from New York, the effect of it would be that the moment any commodity should reach parity the processing tax would at once be cut off.

Mr. SMITH. That is correct.

Mr. BARKLEY. It would be cut off at the beginning of the next season, although at the beginning of the next season the price might go below parity. If the price had already reached parity in the previous season, the tax could be cut off at the beginning of the next season, although the price might subsequently go below parity and the tax would not automatically be restored.

In addition to that, if the Senator will indulge me for just a moment, I will say that this committee amendment was agreed to, and then later, at my request, it was reconsidered; and I then offered an amendment which was accepted, providing that where the fair exchange value reaches a point 10 percent or less below the parity price the tax may be reduced. So that 10 percent below parity price is involved in this question, and not simply 20 percent above parity.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is it not true that the present law provides that when an article reaches parity, as provided for in the act, the processing tax is to be cut off?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; that is not the law. I do not so understand.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is my understanding.

Mr. MURPHY. I think the Senator's understanding is in error. The object sought is not merely a fair exchange price, but also the maintenance of that price.

Mr. McKELLAR. As I remember, the theory of the law was that whenever the price should reach parity the tax would not be imposed.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is not my understanding of the present law; and, as a matter of fact, in the case of some commodities, including tobacco, where the parity price has been approached, the tax is collected. In the case of burley tobacco the tax is 6 cents a pound, which puts the price the farmer gets above the parity. In order to adjust that situation, we inserted an amendment providing that where the price is within 10 percent but not more than 10 percent below parity, the tax may be reduced.

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand the Senator's amendment, and I approve it; but the present law must make such a provision. Otherwise it would be necessary to make a change in the present law. The committee amendment provides that the price has to reach 20 percent above parity before the processing tax may be reduced.

Mr. BARKLEY. I wish to say that I am not going to object to the reconsideration of this committee amendment, but I certainly shall strenuously oppose the amendment of the Senator from New York if I have an opportunity to do so. I do not think it ought to be adopted. The language of the amendment, together with the amendment which I offered, was worked out by tobacco interests in conjunction with the head of the tobacco section of the A. A. A. and with Mr. Chester Davis, who is the Administrator of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration. The provision was worked out and agreed to, and the officials of the A. A. A. take the position that even with the 10-percent reduction below the parity price they could reduce the tax and still carry on their program.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I appeal to the Senator to ascertain whether it is possible for him to obtain unanimous consent to reconsider the vote. We have now been talking for 15 minutes on this matter. We do not know whether his request is ever going to be granted.

Mr. COPELAND. So far as I am concerned, I am not going to ask further for unanimous consent, because I feel that I had the right to have it in the first place. I am now going to take some time on the bill. I suppose my time on the amendment has expired.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I will ask unanimous consent that the amendment be reconsidered. I have no interest in it, but I think the Senator from New York is entitled to have a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment was adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Request has been made for unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which the amendment beginning on page 40, line 18, and extending to and including line 2, on page 41, was adopted. Is there objection?

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I feel that this is a very important provision. I have no particular reason to object to reconsideration of the vote, but I certainly think the measure should not be changed. I do not think the amendment which the Senator from New York has offered is at all helpful to the producers, and I think it should not be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas? The Chair hears none; and the vote by which the amendment was adopted is reconsidered.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. This provision in the committee amendment is 20 percent. Has the Senator thought of suggesting a lower figure, say, 10 percent?

Mr. COPELAND. I wish I might have the advice of members of the committee who are informed on the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 40, line 18, after the word "exceeds", it is proposed to strike out the words "by 20 percent or less"; in line 19, it is proposed to strike out the words "rate of such"; in line 20, it is proposed to strike out the word "reduced" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "abolished"; and in line 21, after the word "year", it is proposed to strike out the comma and insert a period, and to strike out the language following, down to and including line 2, on page 41.

Mr. COPELAND. May I ask the Senator from Kentucky what was the significance of his amendment?

Mr. BARKLEY. The amendment which I offered, and which was agreed to, provided a leeway, running from 90 percent of parity to 20 percent above it, within which the tax could be reduced. The bill, as originally written, provided that if the average farm price exceeds by not more than 20 percent the fair exchange value, the rate of tax shall be reduced at the beginning of the next succeeding marketing year to such rate as equals 20 percent of the fair exchange value thereof.

In other words, the tax would be 20 percent of the fair-exchange value if it were reduced upon reaching anywhere within 20 percent more than the fair exchange value in actual price. My amendment would permit that reduction, although the price does not reach parity or within 10 percent of parity, providing that the department shall then reduce the tax to a point where it shall not exceed 20 percent of the fair exchange value of the product. Of course, that applies to everything as well as tobacco; but I was especially interested in it because of tobacco. The effect is that the tax could be reduced, although the fair exchange price would not be equal to parity.

Mr. COPELAND. Suppose the price should become 35 percent above parity, as is the case with tobacco?

Mr. BARKLEY. There may be some types of tobacco the price of which has reached 35 percent above parity, but on large quantities of it, it has not reached parity.

Mr. COPELAND. But suppose it did reach 35 percent above parity, what would happen under the Senator's amendment?

Mr. BARKLEY. The amendment which I offered would not be effective if it went above 35 percent above parity, but the language of the bill would be effective to enable a reduction in the tax to where it would not be more than 20 percent of the fair exchange value of the commodity.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Kentucky what the effect of his amendment would be on the manufacturer of cigars?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky to answer the Senator from Florida.

Mr. BARKLEY. It would have the effect of reducing the tax to the processor, whether he was a manufacturer of cigars or chewing tobacco or snuff or anything else. That reduction would not have to wait until the fair exchange price the farmer receives would equal parity, but it would be reduced if it got within 10 percent.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield?

Mr. COPELAND. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I wish to answer the question of the Senator from New York as to what would be the effect of the language in the event tobacco should reach 35 percent above parity.

Mr. COPELAND. That was my question, and I shall be glad to have the Senator answer it.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator will read the language at the bottom of page 40, in subparagraph (ii), he will see that the tax would then be 10 percent of the fair exchange value. The fair exchange value of, say, flue-cured tobacco, according to the estimate of the Department of Agriculture, is around 20 cents. What it will be this year has not been fixed, but, assuming that the fair exchange value is to be fixed at 20 cents—I have had some intimation the Department is going to fix it at 19 cents—the calculation is that the processing tax would be 1.9 cents per pound as against 4.2 cents a pound at the present time.

Mr. BARKLEY. In other words, if the fair exchange value price goes above 20 percent, then the tax is reduced to 10 percent of the fair exchange price. If it is under 10 percent, then the tax may be reduced to 20 percent.

Mr. BAILEY. With reference to the so-called "Barkley amendment", "or is less than the fair exchange value at not more than 10 percent", that means 90 percent of the parity price should be brought into the market. Then we would have 20 percent of the fair exchange value. The consequence would be that 90 percent plus 20 percent of the fair exchange value would bring the farmer, with his price in the market plus his processing tax, to a small fraction above parity.

Mr. COPELAND. There would be some advantage to the cigarmaker under the Barkley amendment over the present language?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; there would be an advantage.

Mr. BAILEY. It brings about a reduction in the processing tax above the point 90, but it becomes 20 percent, and 90 percent plus 20 percent is 110 percent.

Mr. BARKLEY. The 20 percent would be levied on the price at 90, which would be not quite 10 percent in addition to that figure.

Replying to the Senator from New York, the amendment would give an advantage not only to cigar makers but to all processors of tobacco through the possibility of having the tax reduced, although the price itself had not arrived at parity.

Mr. BAILEY. At the same time it would tend to bring the farmer something a little better than parity.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask that there be read in my time a letter from Mr. Joseph F. Cullman, of New York, a manufacturer of cigars for 50 years, and I invite especial attention to the argument he submits.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

CULLMAN BROS., INC.,
New York, July 2, 1935.

Senator ROYAL S. COPELAND,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Howard has discussed with me the proposed new Agricultural Adjustment Administration bill, which I believe is before the Senate committee, and has shown me copies of the wires sent to you, as well as to Chester Davis under even date.

It is not my purpose, directly or indirectly, to in any way attempt to influence the administration as to what they may consider proper and appropriate steps to be taken to alleviate the farmers' plight, but it seems no more than fair and appropriate that after over half a century's experience in the tobacco industry, I should point out to you, both as a Senator from New York as well as a good friend of mine, certain unworkable provisions, insofar as cigar leaf tobacco is concerned, in the proposed bill.

Cigars are manufactured in the United States, with the exception of a very limited amount of clear Havana cigars, from tobaccos from various States. The four main tobacco-growing sections in this country are the New England States—embracing Connecticut and Massachusetts; Wisconsin, Ohio, and Pennsylvania, with a limited amount of wrapper tobacco grown in Florida, and, of course, Puerto Rico, which is used entirely for filler purposes.

It is the custom, particularly with 92 percent of the present product manufactured in the United States retailing at 5 cents and under, for cigars to be made with raw material from three different States. In other words, the filler from Puerto Rico, Ohio, or Pennsylvania, the binder from New England or Wisconsin, and the wrapper from Connecticut or Florida. In fact, I believe the normal formula for 92 percent of the present product would be tobaccos coming from at least three different cigar-tobacco growing States or Puerto Rico.

The proposed bill, if my interpretation is correct, reads: "That when prevailing farm prices surpassed parity prices by 20 percent, the processing tax would be at the rate of 20 percent of the parity level. Should the prevailing price go to more than 20 percent above parity, the processing tax would be cut to 10 percent."

Now, let us take a perfectly possible and hypothetical case of the average American cigar manufacturer making cigars with a Pennsylvania or Ohio filler, a Wisconsin binder and a Connecticut shade wrapper. It is quite conceivable, with acreage curtailments, as well as unfavorable growing conditions in Pennsylvania, that due to the law of supply and demand, Pennsylvania tobaccos will be considerably above parity.

Wisconsin has lately become an unpopular tobacco for cigar manufacturing requirements and the technical position in that State is that a cooperative organization still holds a very substantial quantity—many millions of pounds. Tobacco in Wisconsin on the whole is selling considerably under parity in average.

Let me further assume that Connecticut tobacco is selling at about parity.

The manufacturer, who really runs an assembling plant in putting these three types together from three different States to make a cigar, will then be confronted with the proposition of either studying trigonometry or higher calculus to try to figure out the proper amount of each type of tobacco he uses in the cigar; or what would happen—for we have chiselers also in the tobacco industry—he might falsify and claim to use mainly tobacco in his product on which there is a processing tax in the lower brackets.

It is absolutely not workable on a cross section unless you charge the highest processing tax on all tobaccos for the States that need it, which would be unfair.

The situation is very different in cigarette tobaccos, where Kentucky or burley tobacco is the base for most of our American cigarettes, and which, with certain types from other States, is used for blending purposes. In fact, they have been successful in having different schedules of crop benefits in these States by a uniform processing tax on manufacturing for all cigarette manufacturers.

It seems that if the cigar industry should have a fair and due opportunity to present the whole case clearly and concisely without prejudice before the proper authorities, some ways and means might be devised to eliminate racketeers and protect honest manufacturers, who, of course, would live up to the administration's policy rigorously and not open the door to subterfuge and evasion, which would follow if the proposed law is enacted.

It seems more than strange that to date there has been a persistent refusal to hold any hearings. The suggestion of a hearing is not in any way to block any progressive legislation but simply to try to be helpful to the administration in projecting legislation that is both fair and workable.

I am sure we can count on your good offices in an endeavor to arrange a hearing in order to assist us in trying to assist the Government to work out a plan that not only will follow the principles they have in mind but will also be practicable and workable.

This is the spirit in which this letter is written—not on a destructive basis but on one of helpfulness; and after many years of experience in this industry I know the many pitfalls that would occur if the door were left open to the possibility of evasion and subterfuge, which I believe, insofar as the cigar-leaf types of tobacco are concerned, would be the case under the proposed amendment.

Sincerely yours,

JOS. F. CULLMAN.

During the reading of the letter—

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Under the limitation of debate, may a Senator send up to the desk and have read certain literature, the reading of which takes more than the time allotted to him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This is counted in the Senator's time, and he is now regarded as speaking on the bill.

Mr. SMITH. Very well.

After the conclusion of the reading of the letter—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND].

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, is there any objection to reconsideration? I desire to support the motion made by my colleague [Mr. COPELAND], which, as I understand, is to reconsider the vote.

Mr. SMITH. That has been done. The amendment is now before the body, which, I hope, will promptly vote it down.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, there is nothing I can add to what my colleague has said, except that I desire to make this observation: I supported the Agricultural Adjustment Act last year. As I understand, the philosophy of the legislation was that we were to impose a processing tax so as to provide a parity of prices, which, I believe, was a reasonable proposition to aid the farmers of our country; and I readily and enthusiastically supported that proposition, although I knew that my State would pay a large share of the processing tax. I also knew that the people of my State were quite willing to pay it if, by that means, there would be a rehabilitation of the condition of agriculture.

I have only one other word to add. It seems to me this bill breaks faith with that policy; and we are now asked to provide by law not merely that a tax may be imposed so as to secure parity of prices but that a tax may be imposed so as to provide a 20 percent increase above parity. If the Senate is prepared to go that far, of course, it absolutely repudiates the assertion and the pleas made last year when the legislation was under consideration.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. WAGNER. I do.

Mr. GERRY. What this bill does is to continue the processing tax, no matter whether the price is 20 percent above parity or not; it always continues it at the rate of at least 10 percent.

Mr. WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. WAGNER. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am very much interested in what the Senator from New York is saying. I can find no justification whatever for taxing the American people after the producer of the product gets a parity price.

Mr. WAGNER. Exactly.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should feel that that would be carrying the philosophy of this proposal away beyond all reason. It would simply produce a lack of parity on the part of the consumer to go above parity to the producer.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. WAGNER. I do.

Mr. McKELLAR. As I understand, the present law provides that the processing taxes shall be removed whenever parity is reached.

Mr. WAGNER. Exactly.

Mr. McKELLAR. The proposal now is to amend that by providing that the processing taxes shall not be removed until 20 percent above parity is reached.

Mr. WAGNER. That is as I understand the proposal. If that is not so, then I misunderstand the provisions of the bill.

Mr. GERRY. And when 20 percent above parity is reached the tax goes to 10 percent.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I hope the chairman of the committee will explain the bill in that regard.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if the Senator will read the entire text, he will see that it says:

(A) Any rate of tax which is prescribed in paragraph (2), (3), (4), or (5) of this subsection on the processing of any commodity, shall be decreased (including a decrease to zero) in accordance with the formulae, standards, and requirements of paragraph (1) of this subsection, in order to prevent such reduction in the quantity of such commodity or the products thereof domestically consumed as will result in the accumulation of surplus stocks of such commodity or the products thereof or in the depression of the farm price of the commodity.

(B) If the average farm price of any commodity, the rate of tax on the processing of which is prescribed in paragraph (2), (3), (4), or (5) of this subsection, during the 2 months immediately preceding and the first 10 months of any marketing year—

(i) is equal to, or exceeds by 20 percent or less, the fair exchange value thereof, the rate of such tax shall be reduced, at the beginning of the next succeeding marketing year, to such rate as equals 20 percent of the fair exchange value thereof.

(ii) exceeds by more than 20 percent the fair exchange value thereof, the rate of such tax shall be reduced, at the beginning of the next succeeding marketing year, to such rate as equals 10 percent of the fair exchange value thereof.

(C) Any rate of tax which has been decreased pursuant to this paragraph (6) shall remain at such decreased rate until further decreased pursuant to this paragraph (6), or until increased pursuant to this paragraph (6) or paragraph (1) of this subsection.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is it not the purpose of the amendment to accumulate, as it were, a fund to take care of the payments and to maintain parity, because the tax cannot be instantaneously regulated by the fluctuations of the market?

Mr. SMITH. That is partly the object. In addition to that, in case during any marketing period there should be a drop below parity, without any organization the farmer would be absolutely helpless.

Mr. CONNALLY. In other words, the tax cannot automatically respond to every fluctuation of the market.

Mr. SMITH. It cannot.

Mr. CONNALLY. And in order to have a fund to take care of a possible decrease in the parity price, it is necessary to impose a small tax when the price goes above parity.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, under the present law, if the price were below parity, then the Secretary of Agriculture would at once impose the processing tax, in order to bring about parity.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does the Senator from Tennessee think that the Secretary can pick up the market report every morning and jack up the tax?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; there ought to be a reasonable regulation, and it is left to his discretion. He has the power to make regulations under the present law, and it does not seem to me that the present law ought to be changed.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I do not clearly understand the language. On page 41 it reads, "to such rate as equals 10 percent of the fair exchange value." Does not that mean that the tax must remain at 10 percent above the parity price?

Mr. SMITH. That is in case the condition described preceding that obtains. Then it may be reduced to zero, if in the opinion of the Department conditions are such that the market will remain at parity.

Let me call the Senator's attention to what was done a short time ago with reference to the nuisance taxes. It was stated that if we did not pass a law providing for the nuisance taxes, during the time elapsing between the date when they expired by limitation and the time when we could pass a new law the Government could not impose a tax on what was sold.

Let us suppose that the tax was entirely removed, the tobacco sold during the 6 or 8 days which would elapse before the machinery could be set up to reinstate the tax would be gone, and those who had sold it would be the losers. The Department, in order to be perfectly fair, were willing to reduce it to almost the vanishing point, to 10 or 20 percent of the previous tax, and then, within the period of 2 months before and 10 months after, if they considered that the condition was such that the fair exchange value could be obtained, they would have the right to reduce it to zero.

Mr. WAGNER. I wish to ask the Senator a candid question. Is not the purpose really to validate some of the things which have been done by the Department contrary to the purposes expressed in the act which became effective, which was before us for consideration last year? I am told that in the tobacco industry the producers are today receiving 35 percent above parity.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is not accurate. In many grades——

Mr. WAGNER. I am speaking of merely some grades of tobacco.

Mr. BARKLEY. For many grades of tobacco they are not receiving parity prices.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I insist on the enforcement of the rule. Senators are gathered in a little huddle on the other side, and we are not able to hear what is going on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, in a number of types of tobacco the producer now is receiving 35 cents above parity, yet the Department has done nothing to reduce the processing tax so as to bring the price down to parity.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, let us consider the peculiar brand of tobacco known as "dark fired" tobacco, which is raised partly in my State and partly in the State of the Senator from Kentucky. The present processing tax is 2.9 cents, and under an amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky and adopted, that tax will be reduced after October 1 to 2.2 cents, which reduction is considerable, and if the present law prevailed, when it reached a parity price the tax would be taken off altogether. But under the proposed law it would be quite different. Even though the price of that peculiar kind of tobacco should go to between 15 and 20 percent above parity, though it should go up to 19½ percent above parity, the tax of 2.2 would still remain. In other words, it is really a proposal for a different plan of taxation.

I am very much in favor of the A. A. A. law. I think it has done more good for the farmers than any other law Congress has ever passed. I am earnestly in favor of it.

Mr. WAGNER. It has certainly done more than anything that has been passed in recent years.

Mr. McKELLAR. It has done the farmers more good than any other law enacted in all the years. Look up the history, and it will be found that this is the only really successful law for the benefit of farmers that was ever passed. All one has to do is to look at the prices of all farm products, and he will be convinced beyond the shadow of doubt that the law has been a great farmer's measure, and I am for it. But I want to be fair about it. Our purpose was to bring the prices of farm products back to parity, which was arranged for in the present law, and when the price reached parity, under authority given to the Secretary of Agriculture, he was to reduce the tax until it became zero. I think that plan ought to be followed; but under the proposed law it would have to be 20 percent above, as I read the law, before the Secretary would be authorized to reduce the tax.

Mr. WAGNER. I want to say to the Senator, coming from a large industrial State, that I recognize the claim of the agricultural interests that they should have a price parity, and therefore I supported the legislation.

Mr. McKELLAR. I recall that.

Mr. WAGNER. It was openly stated here that the moment parity was reached the tax would be removed. Now we are going beyond that philosophy, which I think was just. It is now proposed to impose a processing tax upon the processor which will support a price above parity.

Mr. GERRY. And there is no provision for termination of the tax, as I understand.

Mr. WAGNER. I think we ought to adhere to the purpose of the act as expressed in the present law.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield?

Mr. WAGNER. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am afraid I was in error a moment ago when I stated that the proposed law provided for a 20-percent increase before the tax could be eliminated. The wording of the bill is "20 percent or less." I do not know what that means. I think it would take a Philadelphia lawyer, and a member of the "brain trust" in addition, to determine what it means.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield?

Mr. WAGNER. The present system and formula is a very simple one, it seems to me. Why modify it?

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield?

Mr. WAGNER. I yield.

Mr. MURPHY. The original act, in section 2, provides:

It is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress—

(1) To establish and maintain such balance between the production and consumption of agricultural commodities, and such marketing conditions therefor, as will reestablish prices to farmers at a level that will give agricultural commodities a purchasing power with respect to articles that farmers buy, equivalent to the purchasing power of agricultural commodities in the base period.

Mr. WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. MURPHY. That is the declared purpose, not only to attain that price but to maintain it. The seasonal crops cannot be turned off the moment the price reaches the fair-exchange value. We cannot turn them off the same as we turn off an electric light.

Mr. McKELLAR. I entirely agree with that; but it is left to the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, and he has the power of reducing or raising the tax in order to maintain the parity after it is reached. I think it is vitally necessary that he be given that power and that discretion.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] has expired.

Mr. WAGNER. I shall speak on the bill if I need additional time. I have concluded my remarks. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Let us understand the distinction between the present law and the pending bill, together with the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

It is true that under the present law the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to levy a tax which represents the difference between the actual price of the farmer's product to him during the marketing season and the fair exchange value, which we call parity, as determined over a period of years. Under the statute as it now exists it is provided that—

The rate of tax shall conform to the requirements of subsection (b).

Those requirements appear on the following page.

Such rate shall be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture as of the date the tax first takes effect, and the rate so determined shall, at such interval as the Secretary finds necessary to effectuate the declared policy, be adjusted by him to conform to such requirements. The processing tax shall terminate at the end of the marketing year current at the time the Secretary proclaims that rental or benefit payments are to be discontinued with respect to such commodity.

So under the present law the tax is not terminated until the Secretary of Agriculture declares that at the end of the current marketing year no further benefit or rental payments will be paid to the grower.

Under the bill now pending, and as this amendment has been agreed to, the tax which is provided in the bill is to be reduced by the Secretary of Agriculture if the actual price to the farmer reaches 90 percent or higher of the fair exchange value or parity, or does not exceed 20 percent above the actual exchange value. The Secretary can reduce it to a point where the tax will amount to not more than 20 percent of the actual exchange value. If the price goes above 20 percent over parity, the tax is reduced to 10 percent of the actual fair exchange value. But under the amendment offered by the Senator from New York, at any time, on any day when parity might be reached by any commodity, the tax would automatically be eliminated at that time, and the law as it would be written would give no one any authority to restore it after it had automatically ceased.

Mr. WAGNER. That is not the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. As the Senator from South Carolina has stated, the Secretary of Agriculture cannot jack up this tax or reduce it every day as the market goes up or down on corn, wheat, cotton, or tobacco. The tax must be levied in view of the fair marketing season for the crop. There is no other way to levy it. If in any week the price of cotton should go up to parity, and automatically the tax should be eliminated and terminated, and if the next week it should go down below parity, it certainly would be unfair if the Secretary of Agriculture could do nothing about it when that time arrived. Yet that is what would be done by the proposed amendment.

I will say to the Senator that these provisions, together with the amendment I offered making it possible to reduce the tax if the price is within 90 percent of parity, were worked out carefully by the Department of Agriculture in conference not only with growers but with processors, who were satisfied with that arrangement.

Mr. WAGNER. I will ask the Senator whether any of the processors from the State of New York were represented at the conference?

Mr. BARKLEY. There was no town meeting held about it, but I know there were present important manufacturers of the products of tobacco, especially cigarettes and chewing tobaccos, and I think some cigar manufacturers; but I do not know who they were.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I have received some communications and protests from tobacco manufacturers in my State, in which they call my attention to the present plight of the industry. It is not a profitable industry at this time, and now the proposal is further to increase their burden, although they say that they are already paying a processing tax which is giving the producer a 35-percent increase over parity.

Mr. BARKLEY. I realize that protests have come here. The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has just shown me two telegrams, one from Utah and one from New York City, signed by some cigar-manufacturing concerns, in which they announce that they will be put out of business by this bill. It seems to me we cannot legislate wisely if we offer amendments here which will disrupt the whole arrangement of the bill merely on the receipt of a telegram from somebody from any State.

Mr. WAGNER. The action now proposed, however, means that we are changing the policy of the A. A. A. as originally proposed, and probably, at least so far as some of the manufacturers are concerned, we are increasing the burden. There is a point beyond which manufacturers cannot pay taxes and still exist.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will say to the Senator that the proposal does to some extent change the present law, but it is necessary to do it in order to create a sort of backlog out of which the parity price may be maintained over the entire marketing season.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, in the time of the Senator from New York, I should like to ask a question of the Senator from Kentucky, because both of us are trying to get at the same thing, and I think we can clear up the situation.

If, under this bill as written, the average price for an entire year on a commodity such as tobacco or any other commodity should be 10 percent above parity, and the Government should collect the tax on 10 percent above parity for a whole year, would that particular commodity next year sell at 10 percent below parity, and would the grower be satisfied to have it sell at 10 percent below parity?

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not know whether it would sell at 10 percent below parity or not; but the part of the bill under discussion deals with the tax, and it is intended by the amendment I offer to make it possible to reduce the tax, although the price realized is not equal to parity.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I should like to continue my interrogation of the Senator from Kentucky, because he has studied the matter and I have not. Subsection (i) on page 40 of the bill is as follows:

(i) Is equal to, or exceeds by 20 percent or less, the fair exchange value thereof, the rate of such tax shall be reduced, at the beginning of the next succeeding marketing year, to such rate as equals 20 percent of the fair exchange value thereof.

As I interpret that language, assuming that the price was above parity for the 2 months preceding and the 10 months following an agricultural year, when the new year came around would the Agricultural Adjustment Administration officials establish the price at the amount below parity which the product had brought above parity for the succeeding years?

Mr. BARKLEY. Not necessarily. The language in subsection (i) provides that if at any time the actual price received by the farmer—we must differentiate between the actual price received and what is called the "fair exchange value", which we call "parity"—if at any time the price of the product to the farmer rises above parity by not more than 20 percent, the tax shall be reduced to a point where it will be no more than 20 percent of the fair exchange value; not what the farmer is getting but parity. That is what that would mean—if it reaches within 90 percent of parity.

Mr. TYDINGS. I understand that; but the Senator from Kentucky a moment ago said—and I understand why he said it, and I agree with him—that these taxes cannot be varied from day to day. I am assuming, therefore, that we could go along for some period of time above parity—perhaps for a 10-month period—so that the farmer would not only be getting parity but he might be getting 10 or 20 percent above parity for 10 months or a year. When we come to establishing the price for the next year, as I read this section, it says that the rate "shall be reduced, at the beginning of the next succeeding marketing year, to such rate as equals 20 percent of the fair exchange value thereof."

Mr. BARKLEY. The tax shall be reduced at the beginning of the next marketing year to a point where it will not be more than 20 percent of the fair exchange value, which is the parity, which is a fixed price, and does not fluctuate.

Mr. TYDINGS. That observation leads to another question. Let us suppose the price is 20 percent above parity for a year with the tax retained for a year, and the next year the entire tax is taken off and the price drops to 20 percent less than parity. The farmer has had the benefit of the price for 1 year with a tax of 20 percent above parity. I want to know if he will take a price of 20 percent less than parity without the tax for the following year?

Mr. BARKLEY. There is no way to answer that question. I do not know what the farmer would take.

Mr. TYDINGS. I mean how would the law be applied in that situation?

Mr. BARKLEY. Let us assume that for any season, whether for tobacco or cotton, the price has been 20 percent above parity.

Mr. TYDINGS. With the tax.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; the price to the farmer has been 20 percent above parity with the tax, so the tax has been levied on that basis and has been collected. It might be, though I do not know, that a fund would have been created which would make it possible for the Department of Agriculture to guarantee parity by the use of this backlog, as I call it, plus the actual price to the farmer, which might be 20 percent or 10 percent below parity. To say the farmer would be satisfied with that price would be to indulge in prophecy, an ability which I do not claim for myself. It would certainly enable the Secretary of Agriculture to reduce the tax for the next season below what it was for the previous season.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let us assume parity is the ideal condition and something we want to obtain for the farmer. He ought to be satisfied, it seems to me, when he gets parity. He should not then want the tax to go on so a backlog would be built up. The tax, in my judgment, ought to be applied only in order to bring the price up to parity, and the minute it reaches parity, theoretically, the tax should cease. I think it is unfair to tax the American people, when the farmer is 20 percent above parity, to build up a fund for his future benefit. When he gets into difficulty, then is the time to lay the tax, and when he gets out of it the tax ought to be stopped.

Mr. CONNALLY. But that cannot be done until the following year. In the meantime he has sold his whole year's crop at a loss.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is why I asked, if he got 20 percent above parity with the tax for 1 year, whether he should not get 20 percent below parity without the tax for the next year, and no Senator thinks the law is going to be applied in that way. I predict if he gets 20 percent above parity for 1 year with the tax, he will not be willing to take less than parity the next year, notwithstanding, at the expense of the consumer, he got 20 percent above his fair price for the preceding year. I do not believe the bill ought to be written so that the consumer will have to pay 20 percent above parity for 1 year and parity the next year.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, parity is an arbitrary figure determined by calculation over a period of years, which we fix in the law. As a matter of fact, there are still some agricultural commodities in the country as to which even parity does not represent cost of production, but we have accepted that as a standard for this bill. That does not mean parity is to be maintained for a week. The object of the bill is not to maintain parity for a week or a month, but to maintain it on an even keel over a period, I would say as long as the act is in operation, so that the farmer may receive not less than parity for his products.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am not taking issue with that observation. Let me say to those who are familiar with the bill that perhaps they can correct my understanding of it. Perhaps I have not expressed clearly what I have in mind, and I will cite a situation which may evolve. Let us suppose a year goes by and the price of an agricultural commodity is 20 percent above parity with the tax; that one whole crop is harvested and marketed at 20 percent above parity, with the tax included. It seems to me if the farmer, with the tax included, gets 20 percent above parity for one whole year's crop, the next year, in fairness, he should get 20 percent less than parity, so the average of the 2 years would be parity.

It does not seem to me to be fair to permit the farmer on one whole crop for 1 year to get 20 percent above parity at the expense of the consumer, and then be permitted to get parity the next year at all.

That is the question I have been asking of those who are familiar with the amendment. I made the observation that the farmer would not be willing the second year to sell his crop at 20 percent less than parity simply because he got 20 percent above parity the preceding year.

Under the bill, as I see it, the farmer would not only get 20 percent above parity at the expense of the consumers who paid the 20 percent in taxes but the succeeding year he would want parity, tax or no tax, so that he would have gotten 20 percent of the consumers' money. That is the question which the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] raised and which I think is a proper one. I believe if the words "or exceeds 20 percent or less" were stricken out, so when the farmer got parity value the tax would stop, it would be fair not only to the farmer but to the consumer.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. Certainly.

Mr. CONNALLY. A Senator said he did not understand about "20 percent or less." That is water on the Senator's wheel, because if it is only 2 percent or 4 percent above parity, then it would apply. It does not have to go to 20 percent.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator and I are thinking alike on the application of this bill, namely, that when the price goes over parity there ought to be an adjustment so the consumer may come out even.

Mr. CONNALLY. On the other hand, it seems to me this new amendment is in a measure a limitation on the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture. We are saying when it reaches that point it has to be reduced whether the consumer wants it or not. Under the old law the Secretary did not have to do it. He could maintain it for the current year without any change at all. With this amendment adopted the Secretary must do it if it attains 20 percent or less above the parity price. It seems to me, in a measure, it is a benefit to the consumer to have that limitation placed on the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not know that I can improve on the wording of the bill, but I think it is just as well that we have had this discussion. As I understand the various interpretations of the bill, they are these:

That the purpose of the bill is to get parity for the farmer; that if he gets more than parity in any one year, the tax is to be correspondingly reduced the next year, notwithstanding his price may not then be the parity price. That is the interpretation placed on it, but of course the wording of the bill does not say that. If in 1 year he gets 20 percent above parity, certainly he is not entitled to get parity the next year. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee about that.

Mr. WAGNER. I, too, should like to ask the chairman of the committee. Though the tax may be, say, 20 percent above parity for a whole year, the following year it is nevertheless the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture under this bill to impose a tax which will preserve parity. Am I not right about that?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. WAGNER. Even though he got 20 percent more than parity?

Mr. SMITH. Oh, yes. We are confusing the operation of the tax with the operation of the law of supply and demand. A tax may be imposed, and circumstances may develop during a marketing year which will put the commodity above parity, not dependent upon the tax.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEWIS in the chair). The Chair must inform the Senator from Maryland that his time on the amendment has expired.

Mr. TYDINGS. Then I shall speak on the bill, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is so recognized.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH. Under the present arrangement the tax would apply during that year. It may happen, even under the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], that in the next year the price will drop to 90 percent of parity, and even there, if it is 90 percent or above, the officials are authorized to decrease the tax.

Mr. BARKLEY. They are not only authorized but compelled to do so.

Mr. TYDINGS. But the farmer would still get parity.

Mr. SMITH. The farmer would get parity, but the tax would be reduced as the price approached parity, even down to not exceeding 10 percent.

I wish to make an observation here and now. The Secretary of Agriculture has worked out this scheme with the object in view of maintaining the parity price wherever it has been reached, and trying to bring up the price of other commodities. Since we have placed the burden of that responsibility upon the Secretary and his agents, I do not feel disposed, here and now, to offer or support amendments to the bill which would subject us to the charge of having interfered with his program in such a way that the markets, which are to open within 2 or 3 weeks, may open disastrously to those producing the products sold on those markets.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator, in my time, allow me to ask him another question? As I understand, the Senator says that the Secretary of Agriculture, in administering this measure, will attempt to administer it so that over a period of years the farmer will get the parity price; and he says, inferentially, that if in any one year the consumer shall pay in taxes an amount sufficient to bring the price above parity, the consumer will be later relieved of a like amount of taxes so as to even it up over a period of time.

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. The amendment itself, however, does not say that. I am bringing out this discussion simply because I take it that nobody wishes to have the farmer over a period of years get any more or any less than parity, nor does anybody wish the consumer to pay any more than is necessary to bring the farmer up to parity. If that is the way the measure is to be administered, and if it will actually be administered in that way, the particular language is not of so much consequence.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I think it is pretty well understood that it is a practical impossibility to say in advance, just to the cent, how much a certain processing tax will affect the parity price; so the Secretary is going into a field of considerable uncertainty.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. Suppose a farmer got 20 percent above parity in a given year, with the tax; how much would he ask for the next year?

Mr. NORRIS. I could not say what he would ask for; but the idea is, all the time, to keep the price at parity. When the price goes up to a certain point in any year, the Secretary will not change it during the marketing season. Of course, that he cannot do.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is true.

Mr. NORRIS. But at the end of the year, if the price is at a certain point above parity, he will reduce the processing tax for the next year.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is true. In other words—let me state the matter and see if the Senator agrees with my statement:

Those who are going to support this bill have two duties here. The first is to give the farmer the fair parity price of what he produces. The second duty is not to charge the consumer more for the goods than is necessary to give the farmer that price.

Mr. NORRIS. That is correct.

Mr. TYDINGS. Therefore, if by virtue of a tax the farmer gets a higher price than parity at the expense of the taxpaying consumer, it strikes me that in justice the next year the taxpaying consumer ought to have that hump taken out, and the line straightened out.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not agree with the Senator in this particular; I do not think the Secretary will administer the law in such a way that if the farmer gets 20 percent above parity one year, he will try to reduce the tax so that the farmer will get only 80 percent of parity the next year. The object is to keep the price at parity.

Mr. TYDINGS. I understand that.

Mr. NORRIS. When the Secretary levies a tax, if it should not produce parity, but the price should be going up toward parity, and the indications were that in a short time it would become parity, the tax should be retained. If the price should go too high, the Secretary would take off the tax, not with the idea of putting the price a certain percentage below parity but of putting it down to parity. If he should take off too much, and the price should go below parity, the tax ought to be increased again so as to get it up to parity. That would be the theoretical level, but, of course, as a matter of practice it probably would never be right on that level. It would be a little below it or a little above it, with the idea of trying to keep it on that parity level.

Mr. TYDINGS. May I interrupt the Senator again?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. As I understand the philosophy of this bill, it is to give the farmer parity.

Mr. NORRIS. That is true.

Mr. TYDINGS. And the bill is to be administered in such a way that the consumer, either in a good year or in a bad year, shall not pay any more or any less than is necessary to give that parity.

Mr. NORRIS. To carry out in good faith the purpose of the bill.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is correct. So that at all times, as soon as it is feasible, the tax is supposed to be raised or lowered so that the consumer, on the one hand, will not be getting the product at less than parity, nor, on the other hand, will the consumer be paying a tax which will give the farmer more than parity.

Mr. NORRIS. That is true; remembering all the time, however, that as a practical proposition it probably will never be possible, no matter what we do, to keep the price exactly at parity, though the object will be to keep it there. The price may go up a little, or it may go down a little.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee, and then I will yield the floor.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to ask the Senator from Nebraska to answer this very practical question:

I agree with the Senator in all he has said about the purpose of the bill. He has just stated what the bill means. Can such parity as he has been talking about be preserved under the proposed new law just as well as under the existing law?

Mr. NORRIS. I think so.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator thinks it can?

Mr. NORRIS. I do.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator from Maryland think so?

Mr. TYDINGS. The only fear I have, in conclusion, is this: Assuming that parity is attained, and the consumer is taxed 20 percent, and the price rises 20 percent above parity on a whole crop for a whole year, or perhaps for two succeeding years, I doubt very much whether the farmer would want to break even with the consumer on the third or the fourth year, and to take less than parity in those years, notwithstanding he got above parity for 1 or 2 years.

Mr. NORRIS. It would be the object of the law to give parity, although if it were proposed to have the farmer take 20 percent less than parity in 1 year because he got 20 percent above parity in another year I should not agree to that, because necessarily there must be those variations, or at least some variations, in order to keep the price at parity. In the case I have put, where the tax resulted in the price going too high, it would be reduced with the object of bringing the price down to parity.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from Texas. I desire to yield the floor as soon as I shall have yielded to those who wish to interrupt me.

Mr. CONNALLY. I desire to ask the Senator from Nebraska whether it is not true that if the price should go substantially above parity it would be because there were factors forcing it to that point other than the processing tax?

Mr. NORRIS. Probably.

Mr. CONNALLY. The processing tax is based upon the theory of bringing the price to parity. There might be weather conditions or crop conditions or other things which of themselves would force the price above parity.

Mr. NORRIS. And in deciding about raising or reducing the processing tax, the Secretary would take all those things into consideration.

Mr. CONNALLY. To be sure.

If I may have further permission to interrupt——

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. Under the existing law, when the Secretary determines upon a processing tax, he puts it into effect at the beginning of the next marketing year.

Mr. NORRIS. That is correct.

Mr. CONNALLY. It is computed by marketing years, because we would not want to take off the tax in the middle of a marketing season.

Mr. NORRIS. It would be impracticable to do that. The whole thing would fall.

Mr. CONNALLY. If 2 months before the beginning of a year and 10 months after, which makes a year, the price has gone up as much as 20 percent or less, to 102 or 105, let us assume, then under the amendment for the next marketing year the Secretary must reduce the tax.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. He has no option. So I say it is really a limitation. He has to reduce it 20 percent or 10 percent, as the case may be.

Mr. TYDINGS. Suppose, then, the price dropped to less than parity.

Mr. CONNALLY. Then he would use part of the tax he had accumulated the year before in paying the benefits to bring up the price the succeeding year to parity, and that is the reason why it is necessary to maintain some point. He could not collect a processing tax in an isolated case and pay it to the farmer. It is all in one mass, and that is why, as I see it, it is necessary to maintain the processing tax at some figure in order to have a fund with which to pay the farmers when the price goes below parity. I think the amendment is an improvement over the existing law.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, does not the Senator think the Einstein theory would be better than the amendment?

Mr. GORE. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the Senator will first explain to me the Einstein theory, then I will explain the amendment.

Mr. BORAH. I think that is a good answer.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maryland yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. GORE. I had the same understanding of the law when it was first enacted as that expressed by the Senator from Maryland. I thought the purpose was to restore the prices of agricultural products to parity, and to maintain them at parity. I did not understand that if other factors raised the price above and beyond parity, the tax was to be continued, no matter how high the price might go.

I wish to ask someone what the parity price of tobacco is. My understanding is that it is 17 cents a pound.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator will have to define the particular grade of tobacco.

Mr. GORE. I am not familiar with different grades, but I will say flue cured.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, certain years were taken in the effort to determine what the relation between the producer's price and the price of what he has to buy should be. The Senator recognizes that if the things the farmer buys go up 10 percent, then the parity price of the farmer ought to go up 10 percent. There could be no fixed parity price except in general terms.

For instance, if at the beginning of this year the things the farmer had to buy had increased 25 percent above what they were during the years taken as the basic years, that 25-percent increase over the price of the basic years would call for a 25-percent increase in the parity price of the farmer. The years taken as the basic years are the years of comparison.

Mr. GORE. From 1909 to 1913.

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. GORE. And the purchasing power of farm products then as related to the commodities and articles the farmer had to buy.

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. GORE. Then the processing tax is imposed now in order to raise the price of the farmer's products so that it will purchase an equivalent amount, a corresponding amount, of other products.

Mr. SMITH. That is correct.

Mr. GORE. I saw a statement a few days ago to the effect that the price of tobacco, I assume including the processing tax, was 17 cents last year.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, as the Senator from Idaho has observed, this is a question of relativity, involving the Einstein theory.

Mr. GORE. That is the most pertinent argument I have heard.

Mr. SMITH. Suppose we should fix the price at 17 cents.

Mr. GORE. If the Senator will pardon me, this is the point I have in mind. What is the present price of tobacco? I have recently seen the statement that the basic price of tobacco, the parity price, was 17 cents.

Mr. SMITH. That is for a certain grade.

Mr. GORE. And that tobacco was selling at that time at 27 cents. That is what I am coming to. Yet the processing tax was continued, notwithstanding the market price was much above the parity price. That is the point. Why should that be, if the objective of this bill is to establish and maintain parity prices, and no more?

Mr. SMITH. The pending amendments are intended to take care of that situation.

Mr. GORE. I understand.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Who has the floor?

Mr. TYDINGS. I have the floor, Mr. President, and I have yielded to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. VANDENBERG. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. When will Einstein's time expire? [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The inquiry is more or less relative. [Laughter.] The Chair recognizes the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. GORE. The Einstein theory is the simplest problem we have to solve in connection with this measure.

Mr. BARKLEY. What is the solution of Einstein's theory?

Mr. GORE. Ask the "Kingfish." I heard him explain it to "Andy" once.

Mr. SMITH. I object to the use of the term "Kingfish" without specifying which "Kingfish" is referred to.

Mr. GORE. There are kingfishes and kingfishes.

Mr. SMITH. To which one did the Senator refer?

Mr. GORE. To the original. [Laughter.]

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I surrender the floor.

Mr. SMITH. May we have a vote on the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I desire to conclude the remark I was making a moment ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma is recognized.

Mr. GORE. If the market price rises above and remains above the parity price under this act the processing tax will be continued, notwithstanding that fact. To me that does not seem consistent with the original philosophy, assuming that we have had a philosophy for the original plan and program embodied in the legislation.

For my part, I am not surprised that the philosophy has changed. When we embarked upon this unprecedented program, "experiment", as the President called it, it was to solve the problem of farm surpluses. It was the surplus that was killing the farmer, bankrupting the farmer, and it was a serious problem. It was a tragic problem, pleading, if I may say, like angels, trumpet-tongued for a solution.

We enacted the law in order to solve that problem. We undertook to treat a surplus that did exist as if it did not exist. So this measure was originally designed to solve the problem of the surplus crops, such as cotton, wheat, pork, and lard. It was not long before it was applied to deficiency crops, as well as surplus crops.

We do not produce anything like the amount of wool that we require or that we consume—I believe one-third or one-half of the amount, or some such matter—and yet this measure, designed as a solution of the surplus problem, was applied to wool, a deficiency crop.

Not only that, we raise only a small percentage of the amount of sugar consumed by the American people. Yet sugar has been included within the range of this legislation as if it were a surplus crop.

My point is that there must be something else than the establishment and maintenance of a parity price, just as we shift from a surplus crop to a deficiency crop. I think this measure is going beyond its original limit, and it probably will react upon the sponsors of the measure in the long run. Like vaulting ambition, it may overleap itself and fall upon the other side.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desire to read into the RECORD a telegram which I have received from my home town, under date of July 10. It is signed by J. F. Whittaker Cigar Co. I know Mr. Whittaker and members of his company. They are men of integrity, and I am sure they would not send a telegram of this character unless they recited the facts. I read:

> We earnestly solicit your opposition to bill H. R. 8492. If enacted it will be ruinous to the already suffering cigar manufacturing industry. Farmers now receive parity for cigar-leaf tobacco. Surpluses have been absorbed. Shortage ahead. Processing tax, if continued, will eliminate many small manufacturers who have cheerfully cooperated with the administration requirements. We should at least have a public hearing and be given an opportunity to present facts. The best interests of cigar-leaf farmers, cigar-factory employees, and cigar manufacturers cannot be served by bill H. R. 8492. Please use efforts to have the bill referred back to the subcommittee for fair discussion and for a public hearing.

It is signed, as I stated, by J. F. Whittaker Cigar Co.

Mr. President, I shall just add a few words to the telegram which I have read. I agree with the statement just made by the able Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE].

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to suggest that a few days ago I placed in the RECORD two letters from large cigar manufacturers in Florida agreeing fully with the telegram just read.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, when the A. A. A. was under discussion I remember reading the statements which were made by some of the leading proponents of the measure, including, as I recall, Secretary Wallace, that the measure was for the purpose of dealing with surpluses, just as stated by the Senator from Oklahoma. Now, when we have gotten rid of surpluses in many instances, we are to continue this tax. Obviously, if that plan is continued, there will be a reaction against this so-called "parity price" and against the policy of the Agricultural Adjustment Act and of this proposed legislation.

Mr. President, it seems to me that when the parity price is reached, then, under the theory of the A. A. A., the benefits should cease and the taxes should not be collected, but now the plan is to continue indefinitely, for that is what this means, the taxes and the benefits, and one excuse after another will be suggested as the days go by for continuing these so-called "processing taxes" and these benefits until the whole system, if it has not already broken down, will arouse such antagonism on the part of the consumers of the country that they will demand the repeal of the A. A. A. as well as the pending measure, if it shall be enacted into law.

It seems to me we are perverting or attempting to pervert the purpose of the A. A. A. and deviating entirely from the plan which was suggested when the A. A. A. was under consideration.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, my apology for detaining the Senate after this long and illuminating discussion is the fact that the State of North Carolina produces from 400,000,000 to 550,000,000 pounds of flue-cured bright tobacco each year and that the production of the State as a whole of that type is nearly five-sevenths of the total production in this country. The people whom I represent, I am sure, will expect me to have some part in the discussion of legislation so directly affecting so large a number of the people.

The bright tobacco is produced in North Carolina in 57 counties, and we produce the burley tobacco in a half a dozen counties in the west. Last year our farmers received $122,000,000 for their tobacco crop, compared with something like $30,000,000 in 1932. Of course, they were tremendously pleased, and, of course, the whole of the Commonwealth was very greatly helped, helped far more than it could possibly have been helped by the pouring out of borrowed public money. That has made a great appeal to the farmers of North Carolina. They have repeatedly taken votes in the State on the A. A. A. control policy, and with respect to peanuts, cotton, and tobacco it is a safe statement that the farmers as a whole—I hesitate to give the percentage, but somewhere between 85 percent and 90 percent of the farmers voting—have voted an attachment to what is known as the "agricultural adjustment program."

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. From the newspapers within the last few days I have obtained the information that the referendum taken in the tobacco region on the continuation of this program resulted in a 20-to-1 vote in favor of its continuance.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I move now from that to another remark. Under the policy of the Government since 1933 the Department of Agriculture has assumed responsibility for prices to farmers in America. It has assumed responsibility for the condition of the tenants. It has taken over the farm problem. And I rather think that the inclination of the farmer is to keep that responsibility just where it is. That is my inclination.

I know that within 3 weeks the tobacco market in the flue-cured, the bright tobacco fields, will be opened. It will open first in the State of the Senators from South Carolina and in the State of the Senators from Georgia. September 1 it will open in my State. Whether this bill will tend to depress the price or tend to elevate it is a question of debate in the State.

I confess that I do not know how to estimate prices in advance. The crop is estimated by the Department now at 660,000,000 pounds—that is, the flue-cured bright tobacco—but I cannot tell what prices will be, and I have no way to assume the responsibility by way of lending money as the Government has. The responsibility has been taken by the Department, and it asks for this legislation by way of further assuming this responsibility.

I think the farmers of my State desire that I shall support this legislation. I think that they, probably without having examined the details of this system of raising and lowering the taxes, would rather that I should support it.

There has been a great deal of confusion, but the system can be simply stated. There are processing taxes to account for the difference between the market price and the fair exchange value. That is fundamental. There is provision for the reduction of the taxes to naught whenever the Secretary of Agriculture is persuaded or finds for one reason or another than the processing taxes are tending to reduce consumption of the finished product and therefore to accumulate surpluses.

Then, there is a further provision for fixing the tax for the ensuing year upon a range of price from 90 percent of parity to 120 percent in a preceding year, and, in that event, the tax is fixed at 20 percent of the fair exchange value. And finally, the tax is provided to be 10 percent of the fair exchange value when for the period of a marketing year the price gets up above 120 percent of parity.

Those are the four provisions of the bill and they are intended to provide a certain amount of elasticity, I think, with a view to undertaking to maintain something around parity—from 90 percent of parity to more than 120 percent of parity. Whether those provisions will work is a question, but they are reported to us by the committee. They are approved by the Department, and the Department has assumed a responsibility which no one of us here can undertake to assume.

Again, Mr. President, the Secretary of Agriculture and the head of the tobacco division were in my State early in this year and stood face to face with some 4,000 tobacco farmers, every one of whom was grateful to the Government for the fine prices they had received in 1934. They informed those farmers that their prices were too high. That was very disagreeable to a great many of the farmers. These gentlemen even said they intended to pursue a policy calculated to reduce those prices. And this was very disagreeable.

I am going on record. I do not want the prices of tobacco reduced in North Carolina. If I thought that was going to be brought about by the bill I should vote against it. I have no way on earth to determine in advance about that. I cannot foretell prices. I am here charged with the notice that in all probability there is a disposition in the Department of Agriculture to bring down the price of tobacco. Of course, I do not want to be a party to that.

Mr. President, there were provisions which made it very difficult for me to consider voting for this legislation, but many of them have been eliminated.

In view of all the circumstances and rather valuable amendments which have been made, and especially in view of the fact that this policy is a national policy now relating to all manner of crops, and further in view of the fact that the farmers of North Carolina after a fair trial have voted in overwhelming numbers for this policy, and in view of the further fact that they have not received fair prices at hardly any time in all the history of their operations and are receiving today only 10 percent of the national income whereas they constitute 27 percent of the population, and in view of the fact that I know of no other course to pursue—and there is no other measure proposed—except to continue the policy until it proves itself to their satisfaction, I am going to vote for the bill when we come to the final vote. The responsibility has been taken by the Department of Agriculture; the farmers have approved that responsibility. I am willing that that responsibility shall remain where it is, if, for no other reason, to give the system a fair trial under an administration that has asked for it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York to eliminate from the committee amendment on page 40, lines 18 and 19, the words " by 20 percent or less."

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, several days ago I gave notice that I should offer an amendment upon the reconsideration of this committee amendment. My amendment to the committee amendment is intended only to apply to the language in lines 15 and 16, on page 40, to define the language " during the 2 months immediately preceding and the first 10 months of any marketing year ", so as to make it definite that it is intended to be a year of 12 months. There is some debate as to the character of the year.

The Chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry has agreed to accept the amendment, and I may say I have consulted with the Department of Agriculture, and they approve it.

Accordingly, I move, in the committee amendment, on page 40, line 15, after the words " during the ", to insert the words " 12 months' period consisting of the."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the committee amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed in the committee amendment, on page 40, line 15, after the words " during the ", to insert the words " 12 months' period consisting of the ", so as to make the sentence read:

> If the average farm price of any commodity, the rate of tax on the processing of which is prescribed in paragraphs (2), (3), (4), or (5) of this subsection, during the 12 months' period consisting of the 2 months immediately preceding and the first 10 months of any marketing year.

Mr. SMITH. As the Senator stated, that is agreeable to the chairman of the committee and also to the Department.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, may we now have a vote on the committee amendment as amended?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I desire to move a reconsideration of the vote by which the Senate rejected the committee amendment on page 45, commencing in line 17. That amendment was rejected 2 days ago. Unless the motion is made at this time, the time within which it can be made will expire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia give notice, or does he make the motion?

Mr. RUSSELL. I submit the motion. I move that the Senate reconsider its action in rejecting the committee amendment on page 45, commencing in line 17, designated as " Sec. 15 ", imposing a compensatory tax on rayon.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, does that have anything to do with the imposition of a tax on jute?

Mr. RUSSELL. Nothing whatever; but I may say that before consideration of the bill shall finally be concluded I intend to submit an amendment in relation to jute.

Mr. BORAH. That is what I have been watching for.

Mr. WAGNER subsequently said: Mr. President, I understand that the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] has entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the so-called " rayon amendment " was rejected by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. WAGNER. Is that motion to be considered tomorrow?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has no information on that subject.

Mr. KING. Undoubtedly it will be.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the nature of things the motion could be called up tomorrow. The Chair understands it is to go over today.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, as a matter of fact, will not that motion be the first order of business tomorrow?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not so understand; but it could be so called up.

Mr. RUSSELL entered the Chamber.

Mr. WAGNER. The Senator from Georgia is now present. I was about to ask the Senator whether it is his purpose to bring up the motion tomorrow.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, as I understand the rules, it will be necessary for the motion to be considered tomorrow, it being the pending question. I have no objection to its being postponed to some later date if the Senator from New York desires.

Mr. WAGNER. No; I intended not to be here tomorrow, but under the circumstances I shall have to forego the pleasure of a day in New York.

Mr. RUSSELL. I understand that the motion is the pending question.

Mr. WAGNER. Very well.

NEEDS OF THE OLDER YOUTH GROUP

Mr. WALSH presented a letter from Frank W. Barber, of Springfield, Mass., with an accompanying outline relative to the needs of the older youth group, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEDERAL EMERGENCY RELIEF ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., July 17, 1935.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WALSH: Enclosed is a brief outline concerning the needs of the older youth group, about which I spoke with you briefly on last Thursday. Something must be done for this group of most distressed young people.

Very sincerely,

FRANK W. BARBER.

THE LOST GENERATION—WHAT CAN BE DONE ABOUT IT?

The age group 25 to 29 is in serious danger and may represent the gravest danger to the country. This group normally represents enthusiasm, determination, vision, and power. Here are found those highly trained, prepared people with daring, courage, and untiring industry. Here is laid the foundation of home and success.

With opportunity removed, vision is lost, courage slips, enthusiasm turns to cynicism, power is wasted, homes are broken; doubt, disgust, fear, and "don't care" are mixed and mingled until life becomes an impossible tangle. This cannot go on. Something must be done, and that quickly, if this group is to be saved for America.

Statistics show this age group next to the highest in unemployment, the highest being age 21 to 24.

A study in two States shows:

Unemployed

In Massachusetts:
Age 20 to 24	80,444
Age 25 to 29	48,725
Age 30 to 34	37,263
In Pennsylvania:
Age 20 to 24	197,838
Age 25 to 29	106,150

The new Youth Administration aims to reach the age group 20 to 24, while perhaps a more distressed group is left with no plan.

It is not enough to say that these people will be reached through regular channels of relief. The problem is a specific one and demands specific attention. These young people must not be forced to accept welfare, dole, nor mere relief work. They must have experience and opportunities that are real. Many must be rehabilitated, retrained, brought back into right relationships with home and community. They must be counselled, guided, readjusted, and set straight.

A PROPOSAL

Organize a supplementary youth service to go hand in hand with the National Youth Administration. This service might be an extension of the National Youth Administration, to include ages up to 30, with a program adapted to the needs of the older group.

The program should include:

1. Occupational guidance and vocational adjustment.
2. Opportunities for retraining and additional training.
3. Rehabilitation and resettlement opportunities to enable them to take part in actual production. This might include—

Industrial rehabilitation.
Agricultural production.
Housing.

New communities might be built up, and broken-down communities, both industrial and agricultural, rehabilitated.

4. Public Works Administration projects devised, especially to provide experience, training, and production opportunities.
5. Opportunities for leadership in connection with the National Youth Administration.

In every case opportunities should include sufficient income possibilities to enable those in the program to carry their obligations and to live satisfactorily with a challenge calling for best effort and normal expectation of success.

The national resettlement might carry this program for industrial centers as well as for the rural areas.

The present generation, ready to take its place in the life of the Nation, must not be lost. It must be rehabilitated. Youth will not wait. It must use its power or it will break.

FRANK W. BARBER,
Springfield, Mass.

Resolved, That the Committee on Immigration hereby is authorized to employ for the remainder of the present session an assistant clerk to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate at the rate of $2,400 per annum.

AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ADMINISTRATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8492) to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] to reconsider the vote whereby section 15, beginning on line 17, page 45, was stricken from the bill.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, the original act creating the Agricultural Adjustment Administration vested in the Secretary of Agriculture power to levy what are known as "compensatory taxes" on fabrics or vegetable fibers which come in competition with cotton.

It was recognized that in adopting the program of drastic reduction in the amount of cotton produced in this country it was wholly probable, if not inevitable, considering that the processing tax of 4.2 cents a pound is passed on to the consumer of cotton fabrics, that there would be a shifting to the consumption of other fabrics or fibers which were less expensive than cotton. The committee adopted an amendment which provided for the imposition of a compensatory tax on rayon, but when the matter was pending before the Senate the committee amendment was voted down.

Mr. President, the cotton-mill operators and the operatives in the mills, those who toil at the looms, and the cotton producers of my State are firmly convinced that the processing tax on cotton has caused an increased consumption of rayon in this country, and therefore it is necessary, if the cotton industry is not to be permanently injured, that this compensatory tax be levied upon rayon.

I have received a great number of communications from citizens of my State on this subject. It is not my intention to clutter up the RECORD by offering all these communications as part of my remarks, but, as representative of all the letters which have been received from the cotton-mill operators of my State, I wish to read some extracts from a letter written to me by Mr. Julian K. Morrison, president of the Southern Brighton Mills, located at Shannon, Ga. Mr. Morrison states in this letter:

SOUTHERN BRIGHTON MILLS,
MANUFACTURERS OF COTTON AND SPECIAL FABRICS,
Shannon, Ga., July 5, 1935.

Hon. R. B. RUSSELL, JR.,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR RUSSELL: I am writing to urge your cooperation in the matter of securing protection to the cotton textile industry by fixing in the proposed A. A. A. amendments adequate compensatory taxes on silk, rayon, jute, and certain paper products. If the cotton textile industry is to be expected to continue to carry the terrific burdens which have been placed on it through the processing tax on cotton, it certainly seems only reasonable to demand and expect to receive adequate protection which could be afforded by the fixing of compensatory taxes on its principal competitors.

No doubt you are well informed as to the present deplorable state of the textile industry. It would be difficult to conceive of a more horrible condition than that which now exists in this industry. For instance, in our own plant, which had established an enviable record for continuous operation prior to the last 2 years, we are at present operating at less than 50 percent of capacity, and we have during recent weeks faced the tragic necessity of laying off scores of our employees, some of whom have been employed by this company for many years. Our individual situation is but a duplicate of that which exists practically throughout the industry.

I ask, Mr. President, that the remainder of the letter be incorporated in my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The remainder of the letter is as follows:

There seems little which can be hoped for in the way of relief as a result of the many investigations which have recently been conducted through Federal agencies. It is significant to note that no report has been made as to the result of the recent investigation by the Cabinet committee, and it seems safe to conclude that the industry may expect no relief from the many unfortunate and unfavorable conditions which were disclosed during those hearings.

It would seem, therefore, that the industry could reasonably expect to receive at least that amount of protection which would be afforded through the fixing of compensatory taxes on the products of its chief competitors.

It is my own candid opinion that this industry is facing complete annihilation unless some relief is granted it. Certainly it is a fact that present conditions cannot continue indefinitely if the complete collapse of the industry is to be avoided.

I certainly hope, therefore, that you will be willing to lend your efforts in this matter which affects so vitally an industry which constitutes the principal industrial activity of this State and on which tens of thousands of its citizens are dependent for their sole means of employment and support.

Very truly yours,

JULIAN K. MORRISON, President.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, this is one case where the interests of the cotton farmer, the interests of the cotton-mill owner, and the interests of those who toil in the cotton mills are common, where they have a common cause and are entitled to mutual protection against a shift of consumption to this competing fabric known as "rayon."

It is true cotton linters in large part enter into the manufacture of rayon, but, as I understand, the processing tax is not even levied and assessed on the cotton that goes into the manufacture of rayon, the article which is in competition with the cotton product, on which the processing tax has been paid.

I think the cotton farmers and the cotton manufacturers are entitled to the protection of this tax. The farmers of Georgia and of the South generally are in favor of the Agricultural Adjustment program, but the fact remains that when we analyze the program in all its details the cotton farmer of the South is receiving less benefit from the program than is the producer of any other basic commodity included in the bill. For this reason the cotton farmer is entitled to the protection this amendment will afford.

The average benefit payments made to the cotton farmers of my State who have signed contracts with the Agricultural Adjustment Administration amount to but $77.65 per farmer. In our sister State of South Carolina the average payment to the holder of the cotton contract with the Agricultural Adjustment Administration amounts to only $80.97 per farmer. The great State of Texas is the leading State of the Union in the production of cotton. The producers of cotton in Texas receive the highest average benefit payment of any cotton producers in the country, and yet the average payment made to cotton producers in the State of Texas amounts to only $109.02.

The cotton farmer is required to make a reduction in the amount of his products for this year amounting to 35 percent of his total production. In addition to that cotton is the only great basic necessary commodity where the farmer has imposed upon him a compulsory restrictive program which limits the amount he might produce.

On the other hand, when we see the benefits paid to producers of other commodities it makes all the more clear and all the more glaring the proof of the statement that the cotton farmer is not receiving an equal share in the benefits distributed by the Government through its agricultural program.

In the State of Kansas, the great wheat-producing State, the average payment to the average wheat farmer under this program in 1934 amounted to $323.16. There is no compulsory restrictive program in wheat and only a 10-percent reduction in production is required of contract signers. In the State of Montana——

Mr. McGILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. RUSSELL. I am glad to yield.

Mr. McGILL. I am in sympathy with the Senator's proposal, but is it not true that the number of cotton farmers is greatly in excess of the number of wheat farmers?

Mr. RUSSELL. That statement might be true; but it so happens that in the case of Kansas, with less than 2,000,000 people, there were 94,000 contract signers of wheat contracts. In the State of Georgia, with approximately 3,000,000 people, there are only 105,000 contract signers of cotton contracts with the Agricultural Adjustment Administration.

Mr. McGILL. Is it not true, however, that the wheat farmer cultivated a much larger acreage than did the cotton farmer?

Mr. RUSSELL. I am not informed as to that; but I do not think the total acreage planted to wheat in Kansas, as compared with the total acreage planted to cotton in Georgia, will anywhere near justify the disparity in these figures. Understand, I am not complaining of the payments made to the wheat farmers of Kansas or the corn farmers of the West. I am happy to see the farmer receive large benefit payments, whatever he may be producing, anywhere in the United States.

But I am seeking justice for the cotton farmer and equality for him with the other producers of the country. Why should the producers of cotton receive only the crumbs? Under the corn-hog program the average amount paid to 172,728 contract signers in the State of Iowa was $228.18 to each contract signer. Iowa has less than two and one-half million people, yet payments by the Government in that State totaled nearly $40,000,000 in 1934.

What I am doing is insisting on giving the cotton farmer something approximating a fair share of the profits derived from the program. When we take into consideration the total amount paid the discrepancy is all the more glaring. In the State of Georgia, with 105,000 contract signers under the cotton program, the total payments were $8,153,000. In the State of Kansas, with a million people less than live in Georgia, the total payments made to the wheat farmers in 1934 amounted to $30,377,000.

Mr. McGILL. I recognize all the Senator has said as being quite accurate; and as I stated in the beginning, I am in sympathy with his proposal.

Mr. RUSSELL. I appreciate the fair attitude on the part of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. McGILL. However, is it not true that more money has been paid in the entire country in benefit payments on cotton to the cotton farmers than has been paid in benefit payments on wheat to the wheat farmers?

Mr. RUSSELL. I am not in a position either to deny or affirm that statement because I have not compared the figures.

Mr. McGILL. I think the Senator will find that the processing tax on cotton has yielded more than has the processing tax on wheat, and that the cotton farmers as a whole have received more money in benefit payments than the wheat farmers have received. Nevertheless, I do not want to interfere with the Senator's argument and shall support his motion.

Mr. RUSSELL. I appreciate the support of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. Which of the amendments that have already been disposed of by the Senate does the Senator from Georgia advocate, the committee amendment or the amendment offered and afterwards withdrawn by the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES]?

Mr. RUSSELL. I shall advocate the adoption of the committee amendment in the event the Senate sees fit to reconsider the vote by which it rejected the committee amendment.

Mr. WAGNER. The Senator appreciates, no doubt, that those affected by the processing tax in the rayon industry have never had a chance to be heard before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry upon the subject of the imposition of this tax upon their industry.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am not responsible for that. The chairman of the committee is opposed to any tax on rayon. I am not a member of the committee.

Mr. WAGNER. Knowing that we have no information on the subject because the industry has never had a chance to present its side of the question and to show the effect this tax would have on their industry, does the Senator think the Senate ought blindly to vote for the imposition of this definite tax, despite the fact that the Agricultural Adjustment Administration today has the power to impose the tax if it determines that the competitive conditions justify it, and despite the further fact, if the Senator will indulge me, that the Agricultural Adjustment Administration had hearings upon the subject over a period of a year——

Mr. RUSSELL. More than a year.

Mr. WAGNER. Yes; longer than a year, to ascertain whether or not there is anything to the contention of the cotton growers that rayon competes with cotton to the extent that this processing tax or this compensatory tax ought to be imposed? It seems to me to be quite an unreasonable request to make of the Senate under the circumstances.

Mr. RUSSELL. The mere fact the Agricultural Adjustment Administration after these prolonged hearings has made no report and taken no action whatever in the matter is to my mind the strongest evidence of the necessity for the Senate of the United States going into it. Evidently there is in the Department of Agriculture no person in a position of authority who is familiar with the economy of the cotton farmer. For that reason, in my judgment, the cotton farmer has been neglected and there is this glaring disparity in the benefits he has received and also in the protection which should have been afforded him with these competing fabrics.

I am using the only means at my command. I cannot operate the Agricultural Adjustment Administration. For a period of more than 12 months I have complained time after time to the Secretary of Agriculture and those to whom he delegated the right to hold these hearings that this compensatory tax should be levied, that some decision one way or the other should be rendered, giving his reasons therefor. The only place where I can make my voice heard in behalf of the cotton farmers and the cotton-mill operatives of the South in on the floor of the Senate, and I am utilizing the only means at my command.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. In answer to the Senator's statement that no one in a position of authority in the Department is familiar with this matter, I may say that I understand that Mr. Cobb, the Cotton Administrator, is strongly in favor of this tax; but, of course, he does not dominate the whole Department.

Mr. RUSSELL. Unfortunately, he has merely a small administrative position in handling the contracts which are in his hands under the cotton program.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield first to my colleague from Idaho [Mr. POPE], who desires to ask a question.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, the representatives of the rayon industry have repeatedly said there is no real competition between the products of cotton and rayon. They estimate that there is not over 6 percent of real competition; that the real competition comes between rayon products and silk products. Has the Senator any information as to the extent, if any, to which there is competition between rayon products and cotton products?

Mr. RUSSELL. I have just as good information as that furnished the Senator from Idaho by the manufacturers of rayon. Of course, when the rayon manufacturers have known for a long time about the provision in this bill permitting the levying of a tax on rayon if it comes into competition with cotton, the last thing on earth we could expect would be that the rayon manufacturers would come in and say, "We are in competition with cotton." They would deny it to the last to escape this tax. I have here, and have had put in the RECORD, and could fill the RECORD with similar letters, letters from cotton-mill operators who say that rayon is directly in competition with cotton, and that it is reducing the consumption of cotton on account of the fact that the processing tax is levied on the material that goes into cotton goods. It is as reliable as the information furnished by the rayon manufacturer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time on the motion has expired.

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not desire to use my time on the bill at this time, as I have another amendment which I may find it necessary to offer. I hope that the Senate will reconsider the vote by which this amendment was rejected, in order that we may fix a tax on rayon adequate to protect the cotton farmer and the cotton textile industry.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the committee which was rejected may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection the amendment as reported by the committee was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEC. 15. Section 9 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(g) There shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid (during any period after the date of the adoption of this amendment when a processing tax is in effect with respect to cotton) a processing tax on the first domestic processing of any material which results in the production of rayon or other synthetic yarn, at the rate of 125 percent of the per pound rate of the processing tax which is then in effect on cotton.

"(1) The tax shall be measured by the yield in pounds of finished rayon or other synthetic yarn.

"(2) The term 'first domestic processing of any material which results in the production of rayon or other synthetic yarn' means that amount and degree of manufacturing or other processing of such material from the spinnerette up to the point where the rayon or other synthetic yarn is in form either to be packaged and sold as such, or to be used in further manufacturing or other processing.

"(3) The term 'rayon or other synthetic yarn' means yarn suitable for commercial winding of a denier size exceeding 112 deniers. The term 'rayon yarn' shall not be deemed to include rayon ropes of more than 500 filaments.

"(4) The provisions of paragraph (1) of subsection (a) of section 16 shall not apply in the case of rayon or other synthetic yarn, or the products thereof."

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I do not think my colleagues in the Senate will accuse me of not looking out for the interests of cotton. I admit that at first blush I thought perhaps this was a very fair amendment; but I hope the Senate will not reconsider the vote by which we eliminated this provision, because, upon investigation, I find that the cotton growers of the country will stand to suffer a great deal more through the imposition of this tax on rayon than they would if it were left out. Fifty-five percent of our production is sold abroad, and the purchase of this proportion of the crop is largely financed by the sale of the products of certain countries which import our cotton; and such a provision would render them unable to take our stuff.

I do not care to go into details. It is not necessary. I want my friends here who believe that I have been sincere in my efforts, and somewhat successful, to vote down this motion. I started a while ago to move to lay the motion on the table; but I am content to let the Senate take a vote as to whether or not it will reconsider its action in this matter.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I send to the desk a telegram in connection with this subject which I ask to have read and which I hope will contribute some arguments against reconsideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the telegram will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

[Telegram]

JULY 3, 1935.

Senator DAVID I. WALSH:

Have heard that the Senate Agricultural Committee has attached a rider on H. R. 8492 calling for processing tax on rayon of 5¼ cents per pound. If this thing goes through it is just another factor that will contribute great confusion to the textile industry, with the resultant unfortunate effects. It certainly has never been established as a fact that rayon has reduced cotton consumption, and, if anything, it is competitive with silk. These taxes are unnecessary, but if they had to be applied should be applied in proper proportion with silk. How on earth can Congress suddenly decide to tax rayon without giving the industry an opportunity to be fully heard, and without making a thorough investigation of the business situation? If anybody looked into this thing at all, they would find that rayon competes with silk, and that it is used as a decorative fiber instead of silk in woolen goods, and that a compensatory tax on rayon is absolutely unjust.

SHAWMUT WOOLEN MILLS,
R. H. WYNER, President.

Mr. WALSH. I ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD certain letters and telegrams in connection with the same subject, and which reflect my views on the subject of a processing tax on rayon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the letters and telegrams will be printed in the RECORD.

The letters and telegrams are as follows:

HATHAWAY MANUFACTURING CO.,
New Bedford, Mass., July 2, 1935.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
The Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: We have wired you today as follows:

"Senate amendment to H. R. 8492 just reported provides an excise tax of 5¼ cents per pound on rayon, including floor stocks and stock in process. No provision made for equivalent tax on silk. Tax on rayon will not help cotton consumption. Real competition is between silk and rayon. Taxing rayon will not increase cotton consumption but taxing rayon without taxing silk is discrimination against American-made product in favor of foreign product. If tax on rayon cannot be blocked, must have equivalent tax of 10½ cents per pound on silk. Letter follows."

The question of a compensatory tax on rayon has been gone over in detail by the National Rayon Weavers' Association, representing approximately 43,000 looms out of a total of slightly over 50,000 engaged in weaving rayon, with Secretary Wallace and the Agriculture Department and the fact has been definitely established to the Secretary's satisfaction that there has been no shift from cotton to rayon due to the processing tax on cotton. Rayon is a popular product owing to style, not price, since the price of a rayon fabric is very much higher than the price of the equivalent construction made with cotton, including the cotton processing tax.

The two most popular sizes of rayon are 150 denier, which is equivalent to 35/1 combed cotton yarn, and 100 denier, equivalent to 53/1 combed cotton yarn. Prices on these numbers compare as follows:

On cones or parallel tubes

	Cents
150 denier rayon	55
35/1 combed peeler cotton yarn	42
100 denier rayon	77
53/1 combed peeler cotton yarn	52

The production of rayon in the United States during 1934 amounted to 210,330,000 pounds. From a 500-pound bale of cotton the average mill gets from 380 to 400 pounds of yarn. Converting the total rayon production to cotton yarn on this basis gives a figure of approximately 525,000 bales.

Obviously if no rayon at all were used and if the 1934 production of rayon were entirely replaced by cotton the increase in consumption of cotton would have been only 525,000 bales for the 12 months ending December 31, 1934, or slightly less than 44,000 bales per month.

The only actual competition between cotton yarn and rayon from a price standpoint is in the mercerized cotton yarn business, most of which is used by hosiery manufacturers. The writer has not the actual figures of mercerized cotton yarn production over a period of years, but they can easily be obtained. The poundage is so small in bales of cotton that it should be considered negligible as a factor.

Competition between cotton and rayon is one of style entirely, as is also proven by the fact that the shift from cotton to rayon began in volume in 1928 and 1929, long before a processing tax was even heard of, as statistics will show.

Competition between silk and rayon is largely a matter of price, since the appearance of rayon fabrics in many instances very closely approximates the appearance of silk fabrics. With rayon at its present level when the silk market drops below $1.30 per pound, the consumption of silk immediately cuts into the consumption of rayon. If a processing tax were placed upon rayon, with no compensating tax upon silk, the rayon industry would suffer tremendously, as a definite switch from rayon to silk would immediately follow.

This would constitute discrimination against an American-made product and in favor of a foreign-made importation, and would be grossly unjust from every point of view.

The working capital required by a weaving mill running rayon is far greater than that required by a cotton mill operating only on cotton. A tax of 5¼ cents on rayon, which is approximately 10 percent of the price of rayon yarn, would increase the working capital required by the rayon-weaving mills, so that large numbers would have great difficulty continuing in operation.

Irrespective of the justice of taxing cotton mills for the benefit of the cotton farmer, there is certainly no justice in taxing rayon mills for the benefit of the cotton farmer, who has never had anything to do with rayon, and never will have.

Information and statistics with regard to this matter are on file in the Department of Agriculture and can be obtained from the National Rayon Weavers' Association, 40 Worth Street, New York, N. Y.

Congressmen and Senators obviously cannot be familiar with these details and should take no action without allowing the rayon industry to present their case, which must be sound, or the Secretary of Agriculture would have placed a compensatory tax on rayon long ago under the original Agricultural Adjustment Act.

The Hathaway Manufacturing Co., which the writer represents, operates one-half of its plant on the spinning and weaving of cotton and the other half on the weaving of rayon fabrics and is, therefore, in a position to speak authoritatively and from experience with regard to this matter.

Yours truly,

SEABURY STANTON, Treasurer.

NEWMARKET MANUFACTURING CO.,
Lowell, Mass., July 2, 1935.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Senator from Massachusetts, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Referring to amendment by Senate to H. R. 8492 imposing an excise tax on rayon of 5¼ cents per pound, including floor stock and stock in process:

I desire to call to your attention the fact that this tax on rayon will be of little, if any, benefit to the manufacturers of cotton cloth as the field in which the two fabrics compete is very limited, if it exists at all. The true injury which the processing tax on cotton does to the cotton industry is the raising of the price of the cloth to the consumer, thereby discouraging purchases and limiting the number of yards they can purchase for a given sum of money. Purchasers have a definite amount of money they can spend for a certain purpose. If the price of any commodity increases, they do not spend more money on it—they purchase smaller quantities. Customers, generally speaking, on account of difference in price, do not shift their purchases from cotton to rayon; they limit the total number of yards of cotton they buy.

This tax on rayon will place a heavy burden on the finances of many rayon mills and will, undoubtedly, force some of them out of business, thereby decreasing employment.

There is competition between rayon and silk in a broad way. If any tax is to be imposed on rayon, an equivalent tax should also be imposed on silk. I am advised that this equivalent should be 10½ cents per pound.

This tax, as it stands, burdens a domestic industry for the benefit of foreigners. It does no American industry any material good and merely tends to bring the rayon industry down to the same distressing state of depression that the cotton industry now is in.

We protest against this tax and urge you to do all in your power to prevent it from becoming law. If you cannot accomplish this, at least see that it is so changed that it does not discriminate against American workmen in favor of foreigners.

Yours truly,

CHARLES WALCOTT, Treasurer.

FRANKLIN RAYON CORPORATION,
Providence, R. I., July 3, 1935.

Hon. DAVID WALSH,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR WALSH: Confirming telephone conversation of this morning, the writer will call at your office Monday, July 8, at 10 o'clock eastern standard time.

So that you may have the background of the case under discussion in advance, the following facts are pertinent:

1. The original A. A. A. bill authorized the Secretary of Agriculture to apply compensating taxes on products competing with basic agricultural commodities on which processing taxes were placed in the act.

2. The Department of Agriculture held hearings on July 31, 1933, and November 10, 1933, to develop factual evidence regarding the alleged competition of rayon with cotton. As the findings apparently did not justify a compensating tax on rayon no further action has been taken by the Secretary of Agriculture during this 2-year period.

3. In H. R. 8492 carrying the A. A. A. amendments requested by the Department of Agriculture the House passed this bill with no reference being made to a rayon tax.

4. This week in the Senate's Agricultural and Forestry Committee we understand that a rider has been added to H. R. 8492 proposing a processing tax of 5¼ cents per pound on rayon. We further understand that this bill may be reported to the Senate and voted upon on Monday, July 8.

5. If such a bill were to be railroaded through the Senate it would constitute a special assessment of $12,500,000 annually against one industry to be used for the benefit of other interests without giving the rayon industry due notice or a public hearing before passage.

6. Before the final passage of the original A. A. A. bill every industry affected by its provisions was given the opportunity of a public hearing. Why should the rayon industry be discriminated against?

7. Should the Senate decide to place a processing tax on rayon, it would be grossly unjust to American industry and American labor to do so unless at least 15 cents per pound processing tax or import duty is simultaneously applied to raw silk and manufactured silk yarns and goods. It is obvious to any impartial observer that rayon and silk are highly competitive compared with rayon and cotton. We feel certain that an American legislative body will hesitate to crucify a young but growing American industry with its 200,000 associated employees for the benefit of Japanese capital and cheap labor. Japanese manufactured goods are already pouring into this country, and a processing tax on rayon would greatly increase the volume of Japanese silk yarns and cloth sold in the United States.

Due to the unfair method used in slipping a rayon processing tax rider into H. R. 8492, it will probably be necessary to take forceful action on the floor of the Senate Monday, July 8, against this measure. May we count on your valued support?

Besides representing the Franklin Rayon Corporation, the writer is the president of the National Rayon Yarn Processors Association, composed of 70 small concerns engaged in the dyeing and converting of rayon yarns in every textile-producing State in the Union.

Yours very truly,

ROYAL LITTLE.

HOLYOKE, MASS., July 3, 1935.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH:

Excise tax on rayon is another blow to Massachusetts, and is entirely unjustified. Tax on rayon will not help cotton. But were it justified there should be an equivalent tax on silk. Grossly unfair to discriminate against a product made in the United States in favor of a foreign product.

FARR ALPACA CO.

LEWISTON, MAINE, July 3, 1935.

Senator DAVID I. WALSH:

Strongly urge your opposing rayon tax rider on A. A. A. bill. If passed, will cause untold harm.

N. M. MITCHELL.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., July 3, 1935.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Building:

Understand there is a possibility of a 5¼-cent processing tax on rayon, as per amendment to bill H. R. 8492. Apparently no similar tax is proposed for real silk, with which rayon competes. Urgently request you act to prevent passage of this bill, at least until the rayon industry has an opportunity to be heard. This bill places a very great burden on the rayon industry and not on others with which it competes.

L. R. BUCKNER.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS., July 3, 1935.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH:

Senate amendment to H. R. 8492 provides an excise tax of 5¼ cents per pound on rayon, including floor stock and stock in process. There is virtually no competition between rayon and cotton, so a tax on rayon will not increase cotton consumption. As a manufacturer who uses both cotton and rayon, we protest this as unjust unless an equivalent tax of 10½ cents per pound is put on silk.

BOOTH MANUFACTURING CO.

BOSTON, MASS., July 3, 1935.

Hon. Senator DAVID I. WALSH:

If tax placed on rayon, strongly urge similar tax on commodities, jute, paper, etc., competing with cotton; also on silk competing with rayon, although rayon tax entirely improper. If enacted, should be placed on silk to maintain fair basis between these fibers and protect domestic rayon from foreign silk.

CABOT MANUFACTURING CO.,
NATHANIEL F. AYER, Treasurer.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, as I understand, the pending motion is to reconsider the vote by which the Senate refused to incorporate in the bill the proposed tax on rayon, contained in what is known as "section 15."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is correct.

Mr. CONNALLY. I wish to urge the Senate to reconsider its action, which really had little consideration the other day, because the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] withdrew his proposed amendment, which included a tax on rayon and on silk.

Mr. President, so long as a processing tax is levied on cotton, unless a similar tax is levied on rayon, which is a highly competitive product, it amounts to levying a tax for the benefit of rayon. When there are two competing commodities in the same market, and we put a tax on one of them and refrain from putting a tax on the other, we are giving a tremendous advantage to the commodity which is not taxed.

It is immaterial to the Senator from Texas whether this tax is put in the general fund or what is done with it. I do not wish to penalize rayon for the benefit of cotton, as was suggested by one Senator, who said we should be taxing rayon for the benefit of cotton. Take the rayon tax and put it in the general fund, if that be desired; but it is not fair to cotton to put a processing tax on it, make it cost the manufacturer more, make it more difficult for the manufacturer to sell it in the market, and permit rayon to go ahead without any processing tax, and thereby receive a premium in the competitive market, where the cotton producers have to contest for the business.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. Just a moment.

The bill is supposed to be for the benefit of agricultural producers.

Mr. TYDINGS and Mr. WAGNER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Texas yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. CONNALLY. In a moment I shall be glad to yield to the two Senators.

This bill is supposed to be for the benefit of agricultural producers; and yet, by the action which has been taken here, it is a bill in behalf of rayon manufacturers.

Where do rayon materials come from? Wood pulp, principally wood pulp from Canada. How does it help the American farmer to make it cheaper to sell Canadian wood pulp in the American market in competition with the cotton producer?

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President——

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am sure the Senator from Texas shares with me my great esteem for the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] as the champion of the cotton farmer in this body; but I desire to ask the Senator from Texas if he sees how it would be remotely possible for a domestic tax—a tax levied only on rayon manufactured and sold in this country—to affect the export of cotton?

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not follow the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if necessary——

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the Senator briefly. I have only 15 minutes.

Mr. SMITH. I would rather answer that at some other time.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not understand, though, how the Senator from South Carolina, when his own bill contained this amendment, and when his own State is a cotton-producing State, can stand on the floor of the Senate and fight this amendment.

Mr. SMITH. And the Senator from South Carolina himself put in that amendment; but subsequent facts convinced me that it would be of greater benefit to the cotton grower of my section of the country to have the export market untrammeled, and that he would derive a greater benefit by exporting 2,000,000 bales of cotton, than by risking the doubtful benefit that would come from putting a tax on rayon.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH. I notice that the Senator from Texas was not listening to me. At the proper time I will tell him about this matter.

Mr. CONNALLY. I hope the Senator will. The Senator will have 15 minutes, and I hope he will explain how leaving a tax off rayon is going to expand our cotton markets.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; it will—oh, yes!

Mr. WAGNER and Mr. TYDINGS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Texas yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, the Senator's whole argument is based on the assumption that rayon competes with cotton.

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes, sir.

Mr. WAGNER. Well, Mr. President——

Mr. CONNALLY. I cannot yield except for a question, I will say to the Senator. I am glad to yield to him, but I cannot have my 15 minutes taken up by interruptions. The Senator will have 15 minutes.

Mr. WAGNER. I was about to ask the Senator a simple question.

Mr. CONNALLY. Very well, if the Senator will ask it.

Mr. WAGNER. The question is whether it would not have been a fair procedure and a usual procedure to have those who would be affected by this tax, which they regard as destructive of their industry, afforded an opportunity to present their side to the committee before it took that action.

Mr. CONNALLY. I will answer the Senator.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. Just a moment.

The Senator from South Carolina brings before the Senate this bill containing an amendment providing a tax on rayon, after he is supposed to have had hearings, after he is supposed to have known what he was doing about it; and yet he now says that on further consideration, in order to help the export market, he takes it out.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to ask the Senator from Texas, inasmuch as many people are so poor that they cannot buy woolen garments, if he intends also to offer an amendment to put a processing-tax on wool, as that competes with the clothing of the poor, which is cotton?

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, no; the Senator from Maryland does not think I am going to do that. Wool has already been stricken out of this bill. It is not in the bill.

Now, let me say to the Senator from New York that he is talking about rayon manufacturers having a hearing. When the tariff bill was here, the rayon manufacturers had a hearing. They reached the committees; they went before them; and what did we do for the rayon manufacturers? We gave them, on page 69 of the tariff act, a high tariff on rayon to protect American manufacturers, to give them a bounty.

We put a tax not on rayon but on everyone who buys rayon. In order to help rayon and in order to lift its market here at home, we put a tax on every purchaser of rayon. The Senator from New York says that has nothing to do with it. There was a hearing and they got the bounty; they got the advantage. The cotton producer cannot enjoy a tariff on cotton, because we produce more of it than we consume. Yet when we have before us a bill for the benefit not of the cotton manufacturer but for the benefit of the cotton farmer, who produces the commodity from the earth, Senators rise and say we must not put a tax on rayon, which competes with cotton, because it would hurt the manufacturer of rayon, who is enjoying a tariff of 45 cents a pound on some of it. Let me read the law:

Provided, That none of the foregoing filaments shall be subject to a less duty than 40 cents per pound, and none of the foregoing yarns shall be subject to a less duty than 45 cents per pound.

Senators quibble about a few cents on cotton in the form of a processing tax, and yet they are taking out of the consumers of the United States 40 and 45 cents a pound on rayon, which is an article competitive with cotton. Then, when we say that cotton and rayon, so far as this bill is concerned, ought to be put on the same competitive basis, they say, "Oh, no; you must not put a processing tax on rayon." If we do not put a processing tax on rayon, we are giving rayon still another advantage, we are making it harder for cotton to compete with it, we are adding to it another artificial device; to enrich whom? Those who own the rayon factories in the United States. Who owns them?

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I wish to point out that a great many of the rayon factories in the United States are owned abroad. There are some in my State which are owned in Italy, and they have the advantage of a tariff protection here but are unwilling to pay this tax.

Mr. CONNALLY. Certainly. I wanted to call that to the attention of the Senate. I have not at hand the detailed information, but I know that a great many of the rayon factories in the United States are owned not by American citizens but by citizens living abroad, in Italy, and perhaps in Germany. I do not know the details, but it is my information that the rayon interests in the United States are owned abroad.

In a contest between foreign-owned corporations in the United States, manufacturing an article competitive with cotton and American cotton manufacturers and American cotton producers, I want the Senate to say whether it is standing by the American farmer and the American cotton textile manufacturer, or whether it is going to give another bounty, another advantage, another artificial profit, to the rayon manufacturers, who I understand have already made tremendous profits, and take that money out of the cotton farmer and the cotton textile manufacturer.

Mr. President, that is the issue. Gentlemen may camouflage it all they please, they may varnish it over with their oratory and with their logical deductions and their abstractions, but the issue is whether we are to tax one competitive article and leave the other competitive article free of a tax, and thereby give it an advantage which it should not possess.

I submit that the Senate is not going to do that sort of thing. Give us a chance to have this issue reconsidered, in order that the Senate may have an opportunity for a record vote on the question.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I should like to state that I am informed by the Department of Agriculture that they have looked into this matter and have found that there is not enough competition between cotton articles and rayon articles to justify them, under the law, in imposing the tax. The Department of State, however, has called my attention to the fact that perhaps the largest purchasers of American cotton depend largely on the sale of certain forms of silk for the wherewith to purchase an enormous amount of American cotton, and that in all justice to the rayon business, if this tax is imposed, as a matter of course there should be a compensatory tax placed on silk in all its forms where it enters into competition with rayon.

Therefore, in order to keep our export market at the tide at which it is now, comprising some 2,000,000 bales of cotton, which is certainly a very decisive factor in sustaining the price, I prefer to get the greater benefit for those whom I represent in the form of exportations than to commit myself to the doubtful advantage of the small competition between rayon and cotton. So I hope the Senate will reject the motion.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, a while ago I asked the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] if he did not think it would be perfectly logical for us to have a compensatory tax upon wool. Every Senator who remembers the tariff debates recalls particularly the charge that shoddy quite often is sold for wool, shoddy being a combination of cotton and wool, and that that is the clothing of the poor. Shoddy has more cotton in it than has rayon.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. TYDINGS. If the Senator will let me finish, I will yield later on. I will yield now for a question.

Mr. BARKLEY. I wish to ask the Senator if he is sure that he is right in saying that shoddy is a mixture of wool and cotton. My understanding is that shoddy is reworked wool. It has no cotton in it, unless some cotton is added in the reworking.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let us assume it is reworked wool. It certainly is the clothing of the poor, who cannot afford to buy pure wool. Therefore it strikes me that unless we tax shoddy we are going to throw an unfair burden on cotton, because here is cotton, which is the clothing of the poor, taxed on the one hand, and here is shoddy, which is cheap clothing, not taxed. Therefore people are going to buy more shoddy, and the only way to correct that situation, in my judgment, would be by putting a compensatory tax on shoddy.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does not the Senator recall, however, that we produce only a fraction of as much wool as we consume, and that there is already a very high protective tariff on wool, and there is nothing necessary to be done to help wool, which is already getting its maximum benefit?

Mr. TYDINGS. If we produce only a little of it, then that is all the more reason why we ought to protect the home industry.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is protected; it carries a high tariff of 30 cents a pound.

Mr. TYDINGS. Why do we not put a tax on shoddy and freeze it out? The idea of taxing cotton, which is raised in this country, and rayon, which is produced in this country, and letting shoddy, which is produced in other countries, come in and escape the tax.

Mr. BARKLEY. It does not escape it.

Mr. TYDINGS. And that in the name of America. The very idea!

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not wish to irritate the Senator, but shoddy does not come in free of duty. It bears a tariff tax.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is all the more reason why there ought to be a compensatory tax. It is not produced in the United States, except in a small quantity. It is produced abroad; and here we are taxing rayon and cotton, which are produced in our own country, and allowing shoddy to come in with no compensatory tax on it whatsoever.

Is there anyone ready to offer an amendment to tax shoddy?

Mr. BARKLEY. I think it is a "shoddy" argument the Senator is making on that proposition. [Laughter.]

Mr. TYDINGS. It would be in the eyes of the Senator from Kentucky, because his discernment is so wrapped up in this kind of novel legislation that he would not know wool from shoddy in the form of an argument.

Mr. BARKLEY. There is no difference between wool and shoddy; shoddy is wool.

Mr. TYDINGS. I have not yielded. The Senator has a way of always making speeches in another Senator's time without even bothering the chair to obtain recognition.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. TYDINGS. And that is the "shoddiest" thing I know of. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. TYDINGS. If I may proceed to eliminate this shoddy argument from my very pertinent and pointed and proper remarks, let me go on in the 12 or 13 minutes that are left.

Everyone concedes that there is very little if any cotton in rayon, but it is pointed out here that rayon companies are owned by foreigners. Yet, forsooth, those who hold that out as bait to put this compensatory tax on rayon, rise the next moment to say there should be no tax on shoddy, notwithstanding the fact that most of it is not only owned but is produced and manufactured outside of the United States. They stand indicted by their own argument. They are not consistent. They want to protect the cotton farmer, yes; but they want to protect the cotton farmer at the expense of every laboring man who works in a rayon plant.

There is no more justification for putting a tax upon rayon than there is for putting a tax upon cellophane, because we have now reached the era of cellophane bathing suits, and I think there ought to be a compensatory tax put on cellophane so that Senators who make these "shoddy" arguments will not have to wear glasses in the future when viewing the beauties on the bathing beaches. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator is talking about something concerning which he is an expert. [Laughter.]

Mr. TYDINGS. I claim that is a very good observation, the only good one the Senator from Kentucky has made so far in this whole argument.

Mr. President, the farmer for a long while has been the victim of compensatory duties. The Senator from South Carolina on many occasions has pointed out the great financial burden put on agriculture by compensatory duties. Were he now to favor a compensatory duty on something remote from cotton he would violate all the philosophy and logic and the worth of all the argument he has made when tariff matters have been before this body.

Rayon is something entirely different from cotton. It is a competitive product, yes; but, following the logic now indulged in, when we come to a discussion of coal and put a tax upon coal for the benefit of the miners, let us also put a tax upon wood and oil and all the other products which compete with coal.

Mr. President, if this philosophy shall be ever written into the fundamental law of our land, Senators will be dizzy from the prospect of the number of commodities which compete with every commodity used in human activities. The day may come when the so-called "Guffey coal bill" will be used as a vehicle for a somewhat similar philosophy. Then we shall have to tax oil and coal, cordwood and briquettes, and every other sort of product in order to take care of the coal industry.

In other words, this is a proposal to hit a blow at one man's business which has no relation to the commodity, cotton, which we are discussing. It is a proposal to strike that business down financially, to make it impossible for him to do business, so that another class of people may receive a particular benefit at his expense.

If Senators desire a tax on cotton in order to bring it up to parity price, that is one thing. That philosophy may be maintained. There is good argument which can be offered to support that view. However, there is no favorable argument, and no justice, and no righteousness in taxing an article utterly removed from cotton for the benefit of cotton alone.

Do the taxes levied on rayon go back to the rayon producers? Of course, they do not. Where do they go? We tax rayon and give the resultant funds to the cotton producer. Senators might justify the competitive tax on rayon were that tax husbanded and sent back to those who produce rayon, as is done in the case of cotton; but what justification can there be for taxing the workers in the rayon plants—for that is what it means—for taxing the owners of the rayon plants—for that is what it means—and taking that tax, not for the purpose of running the Government but for the purpose of giving it entirely to another class of citizens?

If this tax were to go into the Federal Treasury for general purposes, that would be one thing; but it is not to go there, except to reside there temporarily, and then it is to go back to the cotton farmer. Well, let us tax all the lawyers for the benefit of the doctors, and let us tax all the railroad workers for the benefit of the steamship workers. That would be the natural logic were this proposed plan pursued.

There is not a Senator who will detach himself from the fleshpots of his own State—the protection of the industries and growth of his own State—who will not then say that there can be no justification for taxing one industry and taking the proceeds of that tax, not for government, but for the benefit of those employed in other industries. The refusal of Senators to tax shoddy, which competes with cotton, is on a par with the whole philosophy and justice back of this amendment.

I hope the action by which the amendment was rejected the other day will be maintained and that Senators will vote not to put this tax on an industry which has nothing to do with cotton, the proceeds of which tax would be used to take care of those engaged in cotton. In my judgment, that would be a manifest and ridiculous injustice.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, without desiring to prolong the discussion of this question unreasonably, let me say that today is the first time I have heard it charged—perhaps it has been charged without my hearing it—that the Department of Agriculture in Washington has shown any disposition whatsoever to neglect the interests of the cotton producers. On the contrary, the Department of Agriculture has levied the processing tax against which the textile manufacturers have been protesting since it was levied, and in every other conceivable, reasonable way has sought to promote the interests of the cotton grower, even at the expense of 130,000,000 people who have to use cotton, from the baby in the crib just born to the corpse in the grave.

The very fact, as stated by the Senator from New York, that the Department of Agriculture has for a long time been authorized to levy a tax on rayon, and has not done it, seems to me conclusive of the repeated assertion here that rayon is not a competitor of cotton goods. It is only a competitor of silk, and that by reason of the fact that silk is much more costly than rayon, which has the appearance of silk.

It has been suggested that rayon is protected in the tariff act and that cotton is not. If the distinguished Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], who had the tariff act before him, and from whose desk I have abstracted this document without his knowledge or consent, will look at the tariff act he will see that there are 36 provisions of the existing tariff law levying a tax on every conceivable species of cotton goods.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Texas did not say that there was not any duty on manufactured cotton. He said that there was no tariff on raw cotton.

Mr. GLASS. What is the duty on manufactured cotton intended to do? Is it intended to protect only the manufacturer, or the manufacturer and the producer? The Senator from Texas knows perfectly well it is meant to protect the producer of the raw material as well as the producer of the manufactured material, because coincidentally it is obliged to protect the producer if it protects the manufacturer.

I read from the tariff act:

PAR. 901. (a) Cotton yarn, including warps, in any form, not bleached, dyed, colored, combed, or plied. * * *

(b) Cotton yarn, including warps, in any form, bleached, dyed, colored, combed, or plied. * * *

Cotton cloth of almost every description.

(d) Plain gauge or leno woven cotton nets or nettings. * * *

PAR. 904. (c) Cotton cloth, printed, dyed, or colored. * * *

(e) Tire fabric or fabric for use in pneumatic tires, including cord fabric. * * *

PAR. 905. Cloth, in chief value of cotton, containing silk or rayon. * * *

PAR. 906. Cloth, in chief value of cotton, containing wool. * * *

I have not read the percentages all the way through.

PAR. 908. Tapestries and other jacquard-figured upholstery cloths. * * *

PAR. 909. Pile fabrics. * * *

PAR. 911. (a) Quilts or bedspreads. * * *

(b) Sheets and pillowcases. * * *

Diapers and shrouds and everything else are included. Everybody knows that the Congress and the Department of Agriculture have gone to extremes in looking after the cotton interests.

I do not know whence comes the suggestion that the rayon factories are all owned by foreigners. That is not true in Virginia, which produces nearly if not quite one-half the rayon manufactured in this country. One factory alone gives employment to 5,000 persons, which, counting their dependents, means that 20,000 people are dependent upon that factory alone. Yet, without one word of hearing, the Senator from Georgia precipitates this proposal to tax out of existence a great industry, yet in its infancy. It is about the only industry in the United States which is not hoary with age. Yet the Senator would tax it out of existence without a word of hearing by the committee, without any opportunity to present the facts.

We even had to plead here in order to secure postponement of consideration of the amendment for 1 day, when there was not one sentence in the report of the committee or in the hearings of the committee to indicate that this great infant industry had been given any chance whatsoever to demonstrate what the best-informed of them confidently assert, that rayon is not in competition with cotton but only with silk; and the Senator from Georgia has avowed that he is not even in favor of giving us a compensatory tax in order to protect the rayon industry from the silk industry.

I hope the Senate will determine to maintain its position. Whoever heard of Ed Smith being against the cotton interests? Why, he is known as "Cotton Ed." [Laughter.] Virginia does not produce a great deal of cotton, I think some 60,000 bales, but, whether it produces much or little of cotton or anything else, every industry should be given a fair show in a bill of this kind.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I do not desire to prolong the discussion unduly; and even the few words I have to say may be in the nature of repetition. But the discussion on the part of the movers of the pending motion has drifted away from the subject before the Senate for consideration. It seems to me that the questions as to whether there is a duty levied upon imported rayon and whether rayon factories are owned by foreigners are not relevant to the point at issue. I may state, however, that so far as New York rayon manufacturers are concerned, they are American citizens.

Two years ago, when we passed the Agricultural Adjustment Administration Act, we constituted the Secretary of Agriculture as a quasi-judicial officer to determine, after hearings and in accordance with standards fixed by Congress, whether or not there should be imposed compensatory taxes upon those commodities in competition with the basic commodities set forth in the act. We intrusted this power to the Secretary of Agriculture, because we recognized that we were in no position as a legislative body to determine the detailed facts as to the extent of the competition and as to the proper amount of the compensatory tax.

Cotton was placed in the same position as the other basic commodities. If there were other outside commodities competing with cotton, it was the duty of those who contended that such competition existed to appear before the quasi-judicial officer, to present all the facts showing the excessive shift from one commodity to the other, and to indicate that injury had ensued because of the tax imposed upon the cotton processors.

In accord with this procedure, the litigants, or complainants, went before the Secretary of Agriculture and presented their case, contending that there ought to be a compensatory tax imposed upon rayon. The hearings, the trial, in other words, lasted for over a year; both sides presented the facts; and, as a result of that trial, the properly constituted judge refused to impose a compensatory tax on rayon.

Now, what are we asked to do? Like a court of appeals, but without any record before us, without giving an opportunity for a hearing to the industry which says that if this tax is imposed it will be destroyed, without a scintilla of evidence, we are asked blindly, without knowledge of cause or effect, to vote in favor of a compensatory tax fixed by us.

To me it is inconceivable that this body, the greatest legislative body in the world, and, if I may, except myself, containing the most distinguished citizens of the country, will deliberately and blindly vote a tax when it has no information whatsoever.

May I refer briefly to the protection of the rayon industry that has been complained of? I cannot understand the relevancy of that argument. If I were a judge and heard the Senator from Texas, I would inquire what the imposition of a duty upon rayon has to do with the question before the Senate. As a matter of fact, the duty we imposed has been very salutary; the rayon industry has grown in this country, until today it represents an investment of over $250,000,000 and employs nearly 200,000 men and women.

Rayon competes not with cotton but with silk. Of the annual value of fiber consumption in the United States, rayon represented 2.5 percent in 1920 and 13.9 percent in 1934.

During the same period silk fell from 15.6 percent to 9.4 percent.

But the position occupied by cotton in the United States remained practically stable, in 1920 being 54 percent and in 1934 a little over 53 percent. It is obvious from these figures—and that is the reason why the Secretary of Agriculture could not see his way clear to impose a compensatory tax upon rayon—that rayon broke into the silk field and took away a good deal of the silk business, but did not substantially affect cotton.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, let me ask him what do the percentages represent? I did not understand them.

Mr. WAGNER. The percentage of the consumption of fibers in the United States occupied by rayon, silk, and cotton, respectively.

Mr. BARKLEY. Among all the fibers consumed, then, rayon in 1920 represented the percentage the Senator has given?

Mr. WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. And in the last year given it had increased while silk had gone down?

Mr. WAGNER. Exactly. In other words, as rayon went up silk went down. That is where the competition is. The consumption of cotton remained practically the same.

I have some communications from representatives of the rayon industry in my State in which they say that the tax we are proposing to impose upon them will deliver the business which they have won through protection and through their own efficiency into the hands of the silk industry. The prices of silk and rayon are now practically the same, but rayon has a slight advantage. If this tax is imposed, that advantage will fade and it will be possible to sell silk in this country cheaper than rayon. In that event, of course, the market for rayon will disappear.

Are we prepared to destroy an industry which has grown as these figures indicate during the last 14 years, to destroy it overnight, without knowing anything about whether the particular tax imposed is fair or not?

That, Mr. President, is all I care to say. I merely wished to present the figures for the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the present law gives the right to the Secretary of Agriculture, after an examination, to impose this tax if he sees proper and the facts warrant it. Hearings have been held on that law, but the Secretary has never imposed the tax. Without having information additional to that which the Secretary had when he held the hearings, it seems to me to be rather unusual, to say the least, for us now to impose the proposed tax.

At first blush I thought there was a good deal of competition between cotton and rayon. Upon a more careful examination I find that the competition is with silk rather than rayon. We have no tariff on silk. If we were to impose a compensatory tax on silk, what would be the difficulty? The difficulty would be just this.

Last year, 1933–34, we sold abroad 7,524,000 bales of cotton. This year we sold 2,000,000 bales less. In other words, it is unfortunate for the cotton producers that our foreign market has been greatly lessened. While that is true, while Great Britain has greatly reduced her purchases in this country and while Italy and Germany have greatly reduced their purchases of cotton in this country, Japan has greatly increased her purchases and during the past year bought 1,468,000 bales of cotton from the United States. In other words, she has bought this year practically as much cotton from the United States as have Great Britain, Italy, and Germany combined.

So it would be very improper, it seems to me, for those of us who are interested in cotton to impose this tax. All Americans are interested in cotton, one of our greatest products. It would be manifestly unfair to impose a compensatory tax on silk when our best customer for cotton is Japan.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. As I understood the Senator, he said he first thought that cotton and rayon were competitive, but upon further investigation he finds they are not. Is rayon a competitor of silk?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; it is a competitor of silk.

Mr. CONNALLY. It is a competitor of silk because it is an imitation and a deception and a fraud, making some people think it is silk.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the Senator is entirely mistaken about its being a fraud or a deception. It is manufactured silk, as we all know. There is no fraud about it.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is it a silk?

Mr. McKELLAR. It is a silk.

Mr. CONNALLY. There is not a bit of silk in it. Why does the Senator say it is silk when there is not a strand of silk in it?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will tell the Senator why I say that. Some geniuses in the world have adopted the methods of the silkworm and devised machinery to that end. The cotton producers sell to the rayon mills 75,000,000 pounds of linters every year, and the price of linters has increased from one-half cent per pound to something like 5 cents per pound, which is beneficial to the cotton interests. For that reason we ought to be very careful about imposing a tax on the consumer of cotton and the purchaser of cotton, because linters are a part of cotton. They are taken into consideration in our stocks of cotton. For that reason, in my judgment, we ought not to impose this tax.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is it not true that on all the linters the rayon factories buy they do not pay a cent of processing tax? They get the linters free of the processing tax, whereas competing cotton pays the processing tax.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think that is true; but that is immaterial in this argument, as it seems to me.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] denounced rayon as a fraud and a deception.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Texas is mistaken about it.

Mr. GLASS. He denounced rayon as a fraud and a deception because rayon looks like silk. I should like to ask him why he should have charged those Senators who are speaking for rayon with advocating a fraud and a deception upon the public?

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Virginia knows the Senator from Texas did not say a word about any Senator's advocating anything of the kind.

Mr. GLASS. The implication could not be escaped. We are speaking of rayon, and the Senator rose and denounced it as a fraud and a deception.

Mr. CONNALLY. Unfortunately I have no more time, and I cannot make reply to these statements.

Mr. McKELLAR. Unfortunately or fortunately, however it may be viewed, I do not concede that rayon is fraudulent or a deception. I think it is a perfectly legitimate industry, which is doing a wonderful work for our people. It allows many of our people to clothe themselves in a better way than ever before. I think it is exceedingly fortunate for this country that we have rayon mills, and it is likewise exceedingly fortunate for the cotton industry and cotton production.

Mr. President, I think we ought not to impose a tax on silk against our best cotton customer, who buys more cotton from this country than the three nations of Great Britain, Italy, and Germany put together. Under these circumstances we ought not to impose the tax. A further reason for not imposing the tax is because rayon, in my opinion, is not at all in competition with cotton.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I do not wish to prolong the discussion, because I think practically everything has been said that might well be said on this subject. But, while I do not care to join in the colloquy between Senators in relation to rayon being a fraudulent imitation, permit me to say it would be just as unfair to suggest that mercerized cotton is fraudulent because it attempts to imitate silk as to say that rayon is intended to deceive in this same respect.

I am glad the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] gave us the figures and statistics he did a while ago as to the output and consumption of the various commodities and fibers of rayon, silk, and cotton. Senators will remember that I contended yesterday—and was the first Senator to do so—that rayon competes with silk and not with cotton.

It seems to me this proposal brings very clearly to the fore the fallacy of the whole general philosophy of the processing taxes. Here it is proposed to now put a processing tax on rayon so as to help cotton. Just as inevitably as that is done, and it was attempted yesterday, a movement will again be made to put a compensating tax on silk so as to help the other two products; next jute will be involved, and so on, ad infinitum.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. Certainly. I am very glad to yield to my good friend the distinguished Senator from New York.

Mr. WAGNER. I am asking this question because I know the Senator's intimate knowledge of the whole subject. Is it the Senator's opinion that if this tax is imposed on the rayon industry it may mean a surrender of the rayon market to silk?

Mr. BARBOUR. I think the Senator is entirely correct. I want to point out further, however, in fairness to the silk industry, that it should be added also that inevitably a processing tax would then in turn be put upon silk. This is obvious; and the silk industry, I can assure the Senate from my own experience, though I have no personal monetary interest in the silk industry directly or indirectly, cannot stand the tax which was suggested heretofore in respect to this phase of this legislation and which was rejected, but will be suggested again if this processing tax is put on rayon.

Mr. FRAZIER and Mr. McKELLAR addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield; and, if so, to whom?

Mr. BARBOUR. I yield first to the Senator from North Dakota. I think he was the first of the two Senators to ask me to yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, as this amendment was explained to the committee, it does not provide any tax whatever on silk and provides for a tax on rayon only as it comes in competition with cotton and not in competition with silk. If rayon comes in competition with cotton, it seems to me under the act it should be taxed; but there is no tax on silk and no tax on the rayon which is in competition with silk, as I understand, as the amendment was explained to the committee.

Mr. BARBOUR. The Senator is perfectly correct. The Senator will recall, however, that when this matter was to the fore before, silk was drawn into the picture; and my contention is that just as surely as a compensatory tax which the Senator suggests is put on rayon, inevitably, as I have said several times before, a similar tax will follow upon silk, and silk cannot stand it.

Mr. McKELLAR. And, Mr. President, in addition to that, we should probably offend our best cotton customer.

Mr. BARBOUR. We might very well in time lose this important customer. Of course, that would not happen all at once; but if this course is to be pursued, involving first one fiber and then another, I think in time we will not only offend our best cotton customer, but possibly in time lose him.

Now, there is no quarrel that I wish to engender in respect to the processing tax on cotton. That particular processing tax seems to be inevitable. It is there now and probably will remain in the law. I do not believe, however, this whole philosophy is sound; but the point I am trying to make is that I am as sincere as any a man can be when I say that to extend these processing taxes to these other fibers will be simply to start a veritable ring-around-the-rosy which can end only in disaster in time, not only to all the fiber and textile interests, but to the producers of the raw materials and those who use these raw materials in industry.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. I yield, gladly.

Mr. BARKLEY. I notice that the amendment as to rayon which was rejected, and of which the Senator from Georgia has now moved reconsideration, provides that the tax shall be 125 percent of the processing tax levied upon cotton. Can the Senator from New Jersey explain why the tax should be 125 percent of the tax levied on cotton, even if we levy a tax at all?

Mr. BARBOUR. I do not think there is a person in the whole world who can explain it. Certainly I cannot. It is an arbitrary figure and, as the Senator from New York said, has been set without the rayon industry having any voice in the proceedings. Certainly by the same token, only far more so, when silk was brought into the picture the other day, there was not a single silk manufacturer in the United States who knew anything about it or who had been consulted or given a chance to be heard.

I hope very much indeed—and I say this with all due respect to my friend, the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL]—that his motion to open up this whole unfortunate subject again will not prevail, because, in my judgment, if his motion carries, it will be a great mistake and will be harmful to the whole textile industry, cotton as well as all the rest of the fibers that have been mentioned, or certainly will be mentioned if we again open up this subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] to reconsider the vote by which the Senate rejected the committee amendment on page 45, beginning in line 17, designated as section 15.

Mr. RUSSELL. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MOORE] and therefore withhold my vote. If the Senator from New Jersey were present, he would vote "nay", and I should vote "yea."

Mr. REYNOLDS (when his name was called). I am paired on this question with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]. If I were at liberty to vote I should vote "yea", and I understand that if he were present he would vote "nay." I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WAGNER. My colleague [Mr. COPELAND] is unavoidably absent. If he were present he would vote "nay" on this question.

Mr. CONNALLY. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHEPPARD].

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce the necessary absence of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] and the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], who are paired on this question. If present, the Senator from Delaware would vote "nay", and the Senator from Texas would vote "yea."

Mr. McKELLAR (after having voted in the negative). Has the Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware, but I understand that if he were present he would vote as I have voted; so I shall allow my vote to stand.

Mr. BARBOUR. I do not know whether or not any Senator on the other side of the aisle is going to make any announcement as to the absentees or how they would vote. I wish to say that my colleague the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MOORE] is paired, and, if present, would vote "nay."

Mr. TYDINGS. My colleague [Mr. RADCLIFFE] is unavoidably detained. If present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. ROBINSON. I desire to announce the necessary absence from the Senate of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BILBO], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH], the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER].

Mr. BULKLEY. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. DONAHEY].

The result was announced—yeas 15, nays 62, as follows:

YEAS—15

Bankhead	Duffy	Norbeck	Russell

So Mr. RUSSELL's motion to reconsider was rejected.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. President, have all the committee amendments been disposed of?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They have not been. The question is on the committee amendment on page 64, which was passed over.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if we may now recur to the committee amendment on page 64, I desire to offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the language proposed to be stricken out by the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let the Chair suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin that the substitute he is offering, as the Chair understands it, will be to section 30.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is correct.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee amendment just preceding that, to strike out subdivision (g), section 29, has not been acted on.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. My amendment does not relate to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question then is on agreeing to the first committee amendment on page 64, which the clerk will state.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 64 it is proposed by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry to strike out lines 1 to 19, inclusive, as follows:

(g) Whenever in this title a refund of any tax is authorized to be made to any person other than the person required to pay the tax with respect to which an application for refund is made, upon statement under oath by the applicant for refund that he has no knowledge, information, or belief that such tax has not in fact been paid, then for the purpose of such refund to said applicant such tax shall be deemed to have been due from any paid by the person liable therefor. Any other provision of the law notwithstanding, the Comptroller General of the United States is authorized and directed, without review of the fact of the payment of the tax, to certify for payment refunds authorized under this subsection in the amounts scheduled to him by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. Whoever makes any false statement under oath in connection with applying for or securing such refund of any tax shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding 6 months, or both.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin in the nature of a substitute is now in order, and the amendment will be stated by the clerk.

The CHIEF CLERK. In lieu of the language proposed to be stricken out on page 64, line 20, and extending through line 14, page 66, being section 30, it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. 33. The Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is amended by inserting after section 21 the following:

"IMPORTS

"SEC. 22. (a) Whenever the President has reason to believe that any one or more articles are being imported into the United States under such conditions and in sufficient quantities as to render or tend to render ineffective or materially interfere with any program or operation undertaken under this title, he shall cause an immediate investigation to be made by the United States Tariff Commission, which shall give precedence to investigation under this section to determine such facts. Such investigations shall be made after due notice and opportunity for hearing to interested parties and shall be conducted subject to such regulations as the President shall specify.

"(b) If, on the basis of such investigation and report to him of findings and recommendations made in connection therewith, the President finds the existence of such facts, he shall by proclamation impose such limitations on the total quantities of any article or articles which may be imported as he finds and declares shown by such investigation to be necessary to prescribe in order that the entry of such article or articles will not render or tend to render ineffective or materially interfere with any program or operation undertaken under this title: Provided, That no limitation shall be imposed on the total quantity of any article which may be imported from any country which reduces such permissible total quantity to less than 75 percent of the average annual quantity of such article which was imported from such country during the period from July 1, 1928, to June 30, 1933, both dates inclusive.

"(c) No import restriction proclaimed by the President under this section nor any revocation, suspension, or modification thereof shall become effective until 15 days after the date of such proclamation, revocation, suspension, or modification.

"(d) Any decision of the President as to facts under this section shall be final.

"(e) After investigation, report, finding, and declaration in the manner provided in the case of a proclamation pursuant to subsection (b) of this section, any proclamation or provision of such proclamation may be suspended by the President whenever he finds that the circumstances requiring the proclamation or provision thereof no longer exist, or may be modified by the President whenever he finds that changed circumstances require such modification to carry out the purposes of this section."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I think that to most Senators in this body my attitude toward the question of the tariff is well known. In 1930, when the last general revision was under consideration, I labored as effectively as I could with the so-called "coalition" which attempted to mitigate and reduce some of the extremities of protection provided in the measure then before us.

Nevertheless, we are now confronted with facts, and not theories. We have embarked upon a program of endeavoring, by the Agricultural Adjustment Act, to lift the domestic prices of certain agricultural commodities named therein to the parity price, or fair-exchange-value price.

Mr. President, having adopted that policy, it would be not only futile but inconsistent for us to permit imports to be brought into this country to break the prices of the commodities which are affected by the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and which we are endeavoring to lift to the fair-exchange value or the parity price.

Every Senator in this Chamber who has given any consideration to the problems affecting agriculture must be aware of the enormous increase, especially in recent months, in imports of agricultural commodities into the United States. Those who are familiar with the reply made by the Secretary of the Treasury to Senate Resolution 111, offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], which I hold in my hand, have had brought to their attention in a graphic and startling manner the increase in the imports of agricultural commodities affected by the pending bill.

I shall not take the time of the Senate, nor shall I consume my own time, which is very limited, in trying to cite all of the instances where these imports are coming in at such an alarming rate of increase. We know the facts, the case is on the record, and it is simply a question, as I see it, of whether the Senate and the Congress desire to place in the discretion of the President of the United States a power, after thorough investigation and finding of facts by the Tariff Commission, to remedy this situation and to protect the program which we are endeavoring to accomplish under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, to lift the prices of certain agricultural commodities in the United States.

Mr. President, it is my information that there were some members of the Committee on Agriculture who felt that, as the bill came from the House, the delegation of power endeavored to be made by the House text of the bill was so sweeping that it would fall under some of the interdicted doctrines which the Supreme Court has already enunciated in certain cases dealing with the question of the delegation of power. Senators perusing my amendment will see that I have endeavored, and I believe successfully, to bring this delegation of power within the doctrine laid down in the Hampton case with respect to the flexible tariff sections of our existing law.

It is perfectly clear from a reading of the amendment that, in the first place, the President shall only act whenever he "has reason to believe that any one or more articles are being imported into the United States under such conditions and in sufficient quantities as to render or tend to render ineffective or materially interfere with any program or operation undertaken under this title."

Then, only after a thorough investigation by the Tariff Commission and a finding that such facts do exist, would the President be empowered to issue a proclamation establishing import quotas, and in issuing his proclamation he must declare that the proclamation is issued upon the basis of the facts found by the Commission.

Furthermore, there is a limitation provided for the exercise of his power even after the facts are found, if they be adduced by the Commission and the proclamation is issued by the President, and that limitation is—

> That no limitation shall be imposed on the total quality of any article which may be imported from any country which reduces such permissible total quantity to less than 75 percent of the average annual quantity of such article which was imported from such country during the period from July 1, 1928, to June 30, 1933.

Mr. President, unless some such amendment as this is adopted and written into the law, it seems to me perfectly obvious that on the one hand we will be endeavoring to lift the domestic prices of agricultural commodities under the Agricultural Adjustment Act and with the other hand we will be permitting imports to come into this country to such a degree as to destroy and defeat our entire efforts to give the farmer a parity price for his commodities. Therefore I hope that a majority of the Senate will find that this amendment appeals to their logic under all the circumstances. I reserve the balance of my time on the amendment.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I presented an amendment similar to the one now presented by the Senator from Wisconsin, with the intention of offering it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I am sorry I did not know that. I would have been very glad to have the Senator present it, and would have supported his amendment, if it has the same objective.

Mr. BAILEY. In making my statement I did not have in mind suggesting that I desired to offer the amendment. I wish to know just why the Senator insists on the proviso on page 2, which he has just read, as follows:

> No limitation shall be imposed on the total quantity of any article which may be imported from any country which reduces such permissible total quantity to less than 75 percent of the average annual quantity of such article.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, my object in placing that provision in the amendment was to meet the criticism of certain members of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the Senate, as I understood, who contended that the House language did not contain a sufficient limitation on the delegation of power, and did not set up such standards for the operation and exercise of that power as would bring it under the doctrine laid down in the Hampton case. It was my endeavor, in including this limitation on the exercise of the power, to meet in that regard one of the criticisms against the House language.

Mr. BAILEY. The effect of the proviso would be that any country which reduced its exports into this country by 75 percent over the period stated in the proviso would be altogether exempted from the effect of this amendment. I do not see why we should undertake to give them the benefit of any exception. We are lifting the domestic price in the interest of our own farmers. At the same time we are trying to take care of our own products of manufacture.

I do not get the effect and the force of the provision of the 75-percent limitation here. I would rather have it so that under any circumstances the American producers and the American manufacturers would be safe from the adverse influences by way of foreign competition of the entire legislation.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I can only repeat what I stated before, that only after consultation with others who are interested in this amendment, and who have given great consideration to the legal and constitutional aspects of the problem, did I suggest this proviso, and place in the amendment this limitation on the exercise of the power.

Mr. BAILEY. I may be wrong, but I do not think the proviso aids the constitutionality of the amendment. I will say to the Senator that I desire to support the amendment, but I believe it would be better policy to strike out the proviso, and I will offer an amendment to strike out the proviso in section 22, paragraph (b). However, if it shall not be stricken out I shall not oppose the amendment. I shall support the amendment as offered, because I am sure it is constructive and moving in the right direction.

I shall now submit to the Senate that amendment to the amendment, if it is in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina moves to strike out the proviso beginning on page 2, line 16, of the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, and running through line 25.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if the Senator will further yield, I will say that so far as the objectives which are sought to be met by this amendment are concerned, the Senator and I are at one in what we are trying to do; but if the Senator remembers the decision in the Hampton case, while the Court did not rest heavily upon the proposition, it did mention the fact that Congress had restricted the exercise of the flexible power to 50 percent above or below the existing rate. Therefore, I feel that we are perhaps upon safer constitutional ground to provide a percentage of limitation with respect to the imposition of imports.

I have great confidence in the legal ability of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], and if he thinks I have erred on the side of being overcautious, I should be willing either to accept the amendment or to accept a reduction in the percentage. As I say, upon this constitutional question, I simply took the advice of others in whom I have great confidence.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Wisconsin accept an amendment to strike out the figures "75" and to insert in lieu thereof the figure "50", on page 2, line 19, of his amendment?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I so modify my amendment, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, as modified, to the committee amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not know that I understand the Senator's amendment. If I understand the amendment, and the philosophy behind it, and the position of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], it seems to me they should go a little further and place a complete embargo upon any imports. Why not enact a tariff act here and place an embargo, or prescribe tariff duties so high as completely to interdict importation?

Mr. BAILEY. I am very glad to have the Senator ask me that question. I can answer it in perfect candor.

We are engaged in a process of imposing domestic taxes tending to elevate the prices of our manufactured products, the primary objective not only being to elevate the price of the raw material but to pass on to the consumer the tax that elevates the price. We are engaged in that process here. It would be fatal to us if, pursuing that process, we should leave the door open to manufacturers or producers of raw material in other countries who pay no processing taxes to come in under the special legislation under which we are operating. That is not protective tariff. That is compensating American nationals as against our own operations.

It is only for that reason that I support this sort of legislation. It is not analogous to the ordinary doctrine of protection. We are protecting our people against our own acts; and I do not see how we can avoid going the limit in doing that. Otherwise, we shall defeat our own acts.

I should now like to hear from my friend the chairman of the committee.

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator one other question? As I understand the Senator, he thinks we ought to have legislation to protect the American people against our own folly.

Mr. BAILEY. I did not say folly. I am glad the Senator asked me that question.

Mr. President, I do not think it is in any wise folly for the Congress to seek by some means to elevate the prices of American farm products. That is not folly. That is fundamental wisdom. We may go about it in the wrong way; but so long as the prices to the farmers are below the cost of production, so long as the farmers, constituting 27 percent of the American population, receive only 10 percent of the national income, we are justified in invoking artificial measures to bring up the price to the farmers; and when we do, nobody is going to suffer. The price to the farmers will improve conditions throughout the country.

Just a word about my State. By some means, probably by means of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, the lending policy on cotton, the control program, and the devaluation of the dollar in gold, farm prices were elevated in North Carolina in 1933, and still more in 1934, and there has been a restoration of better conditions there—an improvement so great that I should not hesitate to cite it to the Senate as an illustration of the benefits of legislation with a view to increasing prices to the farmers.

Mr. BAILEY subsequently said: Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask unanimous consent to have printed in connection with my remarks three statistical tables showing the imports, exports, and consumption of American cotton.

There being no objection, the tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[1] Only about two-thirds of our exports to Germany are consumed in that country, the rest being reexported from Germany to other European countries.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, it seems to me the question now is not whether the general A. A. A. program and its philosophy of scarcity is good, bad, or indifferent. The question is whether, having embarked upon a program for increasing by artificial means the price to the American farmers, we shall consistently pursue that philosophy to a completely logical end. It seems to me the available figures make it perfectly obvious that unless the administration shall be armed with some such authority as the Senator from Wisconsin proposes, it may become utterly impossible to reach the objective which is proposed by this scheme of things according to the theory of its own authors.

I desire to point out a fact which is a salient one, Mr. President, to any Senator as he contemplates this amendment and the program to which it relates.

The value in dollars of the imports into this country of basic agricultural commodities for the first quarter of 1935 is $72,000,000, which is an importation at the rate of nearly $300,000,000 a year of basic commodities upon which we are taxing our citizens for the purpose of creating a parity price. Our own citizens pay five hundred millions in taxes to create better farm prices. Then we allow aliens to take three hundred millions of the benefits.

How much are we raising by way of taxation upon our people in order to achieve this parity objective for the American farmer? I repeat the challenge: Something like four hundred or five hundred million dollars. We are admitting competitive foreign products in the same basic commodity brackets to a degree almost equal to the taxes we are taking out of our citizens in order to pretend to achieve the parity prices. If there is any logic on the face of the earth in taxing the American people four or five hundred million dollars in order to achieve parity prices in behalf of certain specific basic farm commodities at the same time that we are admitting over the tariff wall $300,000,000 of competing foreign commodities in precisely the same brackets, then I do not know what logic is.

Mr. President, it is immediately asked, "What is the percentage of these imports in respect to the total production or the total consumption?" That is a thoroughly pertinent question, and it is a question which ordinarily deserves to weigh heavily in respect to an equation of this character. This I freely admit, particularly in an ordinary tariff argument. But this is not the ordinary tariff argument. This is solely a question whether this parity price scheme can work—and I do not pass upon that in final result—whether it can work at all if, as, and when these imports trends provably interfere.

In the present instance it is the direction rather than the length of the step we confront which is of vital importance. This is what I mean: In the contemplation of whether this scheme is going to continue to work, Senators had better take to their consciences the enormous increase of these imports during the first quarter of the present year. In other words, the constant and persistent trend in the direction of an increase in the amount of the imports of these basic commodities constitutes a challenge to the continued operation of the plan which has been adopted. Let me give just a few examples.

Cottonseed cake and meal, of which we imported but 187,000 pounds during the first quarter of 1931, have been imported to the extent of 35,000,000 pounds in the first quarter of the present year.

Corn, which was imported only to the extent of 112,000 bushels in the first quarter of 1932 has been imported to the extent of 7,000,000 bushels during the first quarter of the present year.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield to me?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am sorry I cannot yield, because I only have a limited time.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan insert the percentages as well as the total amounts?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I have just spoken of the percentages. I have indicated why they are less important than normally. I do not have the percentages at hand. I realize that the percentages are pertinent in respect to a general consideration, but I am showing the relative increase, which is now at almost fever speed as the imports of basic commodities flow over our tariff wall. I do not see how we can ignore the fact that if this rate of increase continues, no matter what the percentages may be, the system which has been adopted cannot work in producing parity prices. We must clothe these public authorities with adequate weapons with which to meet the new hazard and exposure, if we are to rely at all upon artificial instrumentalities.

Of wheat, of which only 11,000 bushels were imported in the first quarter of 1931, 3,500,000 bushels were imported in the first quarter of 1935.

Of canned meats, 2,600,000 pounds were imported in the first quarter of 1931, while 16,000,000 pounds were imported in the first quarter of 1935.

And so it goes all down the line.

Of rice flour and rice meal, and so forth, 118,000 pounds were imported in the first quarter of 1931, while 20,000,000 pounds were imported during the first quarter of 1935.

I submit, as a matter of elementary mathematics and elementary logic, that if we are going to rely upon an artificial effort to create parity prices for the American farmer by the process and method to which this legislation is dedicated, we must also be prepared to give the American farmer the full control of his own domestic market or the whole scheme is going to break down. I submit that on the face of the trend of these imports the scheme will break down unless we clothe these authorities with the power to cope with such a situation if, as, and when the facts demonstrate that an answer is necessary. If the use of this added power is not necessary, its mere latent existence can do no harm. If it becomes necessary, its absence might be fatal.

All in the world the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin proposes to do is to provide, by a method which I understand is brought within the constitutional rule, if, as, and when this flow of imports continues, and it is demonstrated that it threatens to break down and does break down the parity price which we are trying to create by taxes upon the American people, that there shall be an authority that can meet the situation, cope with it, rise above it, and protect the net result we are supposed to achieve.

Mr. President, I again say it seems to me that that is just as simple a contemplation in plain elementary mathematics and logic as could be imagined. I hope the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin will be adopted. Even an opponent to this whole A. A. A. philosophy should wish the program to be adequately implemented if it shall persist.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, when the committee had this bill under consideration I think all the facts which have been referred to were gone over. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] has drawn a distinction between what is proposed by this amendment and the protective-tariff idea, alleging that, as we have embarked upon a process by which we are to aid the American farmer, it is then necessary for us to have some such provision as is included in this proposed amendment.

We all understood that the price of American agricultural products had in major part gone so disastrously low, so far below even the cost of production, as to threaten to destroy, and in some cases actually to destroy, the holdings of the farmers, namely, their personal possessions and their land. As I take it, we had a condition which was intolerable; and we have attempted to bring about a parity price so that the purchasing power of the farmer's dollar would be equal to that of those from whom he bought.

We had long ago embarked upon a policy which has inevitably led to this very condition. Whatever else may be said, this amendment is tantamount to admitting that the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act, with all its enormous duties, is not sufficient to raise the price of American products to a point where foreign products cannot come over the wall and undersell American products.

Are we now to admit that with the absurd, ridiculous, and disgusting tariff act, with its antidumping clause, and with the act which in a way, forbids trading with any country that owes us money, we must give somebody the power to prohibit imports from other nations which, in spite of the tariff wall, can pay the duty and undersell the American producers?

I think the suggestion made by the Senator from Utah is very pertinent. If the amendment now proposed is to be adopted we ought now to declare that we are going to put around this country an absolute embargo and forbid any other nation to trade with us at all. Yet the Senate knows that if we hope to have a revival of American production and industry we must invite the cooperation of the nations of the earth and allow them to trade with us.

The conditions existing have largely been brought about by the fact that the purchasing power of the world outside of America has been paralyzed. We and the other nations of the earth were forced to enter a new realm of financing; nations went off the gold standard; and the United States owns a very large part of the great basic metal which has been used as a standard of value for innumerable years. The world today is in chaos as to the basis upon which there may be trade and commerce, and yet, instead of addressing ourselves to the question of an adequate circulating medium in this country, we are approaching the subject from the other end, and are saying we are going to reduce production in order to accommodate it, with a reasonable price to the scarcity of money. That is the condition that now confronts us. Rather than increase the supply of money, we will decrease the supply of products and then pile Pelion on Ossa in order to protect us in that respect.

The Senator from Michigan mentioned several basic agricultural commodities. I do not know what is the tariff rate, either specific or ad valorem, on the articles to which he referred; but the logic of the argument is, if we have embarked upon a program of raising farm prices, it is our duty to protect that program. All of us must admit that that is logical, but back of it is the objective of increasing prices by the system which it is proposed to extend.

It is not sufficient to say that we are confronted with increased importations. Some of the articles the Senator from Michigan mentioned were forced here by grim necessity. In some instances the commodity was so scarce here that it was a question of whether or not we should import it in order to sustain life in this country or whether we should deny its importation and subject people to necessities of a scarcity which both our system and Providence have brought about.

Mr. President, I believed that it was the Government's duty to create an organization with resources and powers, so far as the Constitution would allow, which would stand for the farmers and see that they got for their contribution to organized society an amount that would justify them in the work they were doing and would return to them a reasonable amount of the profits that should inhere in their production.

But, Mr. President, I shall not vote for recognition of the principle of protection involved in this amendment. It does not suffice for it to be said that we have embarked upon the principle of aiding the farmer and then, when that high protective wall has been erected, say that we will see to it that another layer shall be loaded upon him.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SMITH. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. What would the Senator do, if he should not vote for legislation of this sort, to arrest the imports in connection with cloth which comes from Japan, it appearing that the total for the month of January 1934, bleached square yards, was only 4,000, while in January 1935 the imports of bleached square yards were 2,633,000?

Mr. SMITH. I am glad the Senator asked that question. The question of percentage enters into the question, but I waive that and I am going now to answer him in terms of actual facts.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator let me get one or two more figures in the RECORD?

Mr. SMITH. I think that is sufficient, because I want to answer it as he has referred to cotton.

Mr. BAILEY. Here is the year's total for 1934: Printed side colored cotton goods imported into this country from Japan, 7,287,000 yards; for the 5 months' total in 1935 the figures are 19,127,000 yards.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I have not yet spoken on the bill; but as the Senator has touched the very heart of the matter I am glad to answer him.

Japan bought cotton in America, paid exactly the same price the American manufacturer paid, shipped it clear around the globe, converted it into a certain kind of cloth, shipped it back around the world, paid the tariff, and undersold the American manufacturer. If that be true, it is an indictment of the American manufacturer as being a knave or a fool.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to remind him that Japan did not have to pay the processing tax?

Mr. SMITH. Precisely; Japan did not have to pay the processing tax, but she paid in effect the very same amount the American manufacturer paid, shipped it around the globe twice, paid the tariff, and undersold the American manufacturer.

Let me call the Senator's attention to another thing. America makes 55 percent of all the cotton produced in the world. We consume 6,000,000 bales out of an average crop of about 14,500,000 bales up to the time of the crash. In other words, we export 55 percent of our cotton. It is a coincidence that the two figures as to our production in relation to world production and the amount we export are alike. We produce 55 percent of all the cotton in the world and 82 percent of all of the spinnable fiber in the finer counts. Out of 167,000,000 spindles in the world, America has 30,000,000. With cotton growing right up to our mill doors, with hydroelectric power and other power sufficient to spin and to convert every fiber into finished cloth, we have only 30,000,000 spindles out of a total of 167,000,000.

Great Britain alone, that does not raise a bale of cotton, has 67,000,000 spindles and is dependent upon American cotton. Why has not America enough spindles to convert our raw material right at our door? It is because we will only convert that which is taken care of by a protective tariff. The producers of cotton sell it in the open market of the world, and I do not complain of that because the price of American cotton fixes the price of all the cotton in the world, and fixes it instantly. Therefore we have nothing to fear so far as needing any protection of American cotton is concerned. On March 11, 1935, when cotton broke $10 a bale, Argentine cotton, Egyptian cotton, and Russian cotton all broke $10 a bale.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from South Carolina on the amendment has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, in my time I desire to ask the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] a few questions. We are discussing this proposition as if it were a new proposal. Is it not a fact that when we passed the N. R. A. Act we recognized there would be an increase in the cost of production and that a similar provision was embodied in the act to protect American industries against losing the domestic market by importations from foreign countries of commodities that would undersell those produced in this country at the increased price the law necessitated?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, there is no question about that. It was adopted in committee and agreed to without any debate or controversy on the floor of the Senate, as I remember.

Mr. WALSH. Is it not a fact that under the provisions of that law the President has actually limited the importation of some commodities from foreign countries into this country?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not know to what extent the power conferred under the Industrial Recovery Act has been exercised, but I do know the power was conferred, and that it was generally conceded by all concerned, when the N. R. A. Act was under consideration, that if we proposed by shortening hours and establishing minimum wages and eliminating child labor to lift the cost of industrial production in the United States, it would be not only futile but folly not to arm the executive branch of the Government with power to meet the situation created, so far as the importations were concerned. But now, when we are proposing to confer the same powers, so far as agricultural commodities are concerned, we are met with a general argument upon the theory of the protective tariff.

In that connection I should like to say that if it is proposed by the Democratic Party, which has control of both Houses of Congress, to revise the tariff, so far as I am concerned, I shall be glad to join in an effort to revise it. However, the Democrats have had control for 2 years and have not proposed such revision, and we are still confronted with the situation created by the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act, which, as I said at the beginning of this debate, I fought on the floor of the Senate for 8 months and against which I voted on its final passage. We are confronted with facts, not theories; and unless we are willing to extend the protection, in view of the alarming increase in the importation of agricultural commodities, we can kiss "good-bye" the Agricultural Act and any benefits thereunder to the farmer.

Mr. WALSH. How can we justify under any circumstances enacting a domestic law which increases the cost of production and thereby leaves the door open for foreign goods to come into this country to close up our industries and to add to the line of the unemployed throughout the country?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. So far as I am concerned, I cannot see any logic in taking the position that, on the one hand, we are going to tax the American consumer for the purpose of raising the domestic price of agricultural commodities, and then in the same program, with an alarming increase of imports threatening to undermine and destroy us, we are not willing to grant discretionary power to the President of the United States and the Tariff Commission to take the same action to protect the program which we are willing to afford to American industry under the Industrial Recovery Act. I say there is no logic in it; I say there is no justice in it; and I say, besides that, it is folly, unless we propose to repeal the Agricultural Adjustment Act and abandon the program.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I desire to refer to one industry which, as the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] knows, has been tremendously affected; and I am astonished that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] takes the position that he does. I refer to the cotton-textile industry. That industry has been very seriously depressed. One of the most pathetic sights one can witness in this country is seen upon a visit to the cotton-textile industrial centers throughout the North and throughout the South. The number of closed mills and abandoned communities is astounding. I have information that within 2 months the largest cotton-textile establishment in the world, employing 12,000 people, will be closed. I refer to an establishment in a neighboring State to my own. The reason for this condition primarily is that the processing tax, and the N. I. R. A., and general taxation have increased the price of cotton cloth 100 percent within 2 years.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator whether part of that increase is included in the labor cost?

Mr. WALSH. There is no doubt about it. The N. I. R. A. brought increased wages.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Why does not the Senator include it, then?

Mr. WALSH. As I say, the price has increased nearly 100 percent, which has caused an abandonment of the purchase of cotton cloth, and people have turned to rayon and to silk and to other substitutes. Not only that, but, as the Senator from North Carolina points out, there has been a steady and constant increase in importations; and the Senator from North Carolina and every Senator from a textile State, North and South, have appealed to this administration to use the power which it could exercise under similar provisions of the N. I. R. A. to that now proposed.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. BAILEY. I thank the Senator. My time upon the amendment has expired, and therefore I am under the necessity of presenting my argument by asking questions of those which have time.

I will ask this question: Unless we enact legislation of the character which the Senator from Wisconsin has submitted, is there not a very grave and instant danger that the processing tax will be taken out of the pay envelopes of the workers in the cotton mills?

Mr. WALSH. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. I have the floor, please.

It seems to me the height of folly. I do not see how anybody can justify passing domestic laws which increase the cost of production and not taking any steps to put up any barriers against foreign competition. It seems to me the simplest of propositions that if we pass legislation increasing the cost of manufacturing in this country, it is our duty to put up a barrier so as not to annihilate our industries, after we have done that, by leaving the door open for importations of all kinds and descriptions.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. I appreciate the force of what the Senator says, and I am in profound sympathy with the textile industry of this country. My question is solely for the purpose of eliciting information. It is impossible, I suppose, to allocate to any one condition the total responsibility for this situation. It is a combination of circumstances.

Mr. WALSH. Of course; but certain things are definite enough. It is definitely known that the processing tax added 20 percent to the cost of cotton cloth, and we know that the reduction of the hours of labor and the minimum wage and other provisions of the N. I. R. A. also materially increased the cost. Many of these requirements, I think, we all agree were desirable.

Mr. BARKLEY. All of which presupposes that this increase by the processing tax and other methods that increased the cost of raw materials to the manufacturer of them was passed on to the public, and has been paid; but, while there has been a considerable increase in the importation of cotton-textile goods from Japan over the past 6 or 8 months, has that importation yet arrived at a point where it even approaches as much as 1 percent of our consumption?

Mr. WALSH. It is a small percentage of our total consumption. The Senator is right.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is much below 1 percent.

Mr. WALSH. But, as pointed out by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], it has so rapidly increased during the early months of this year that it has the possibility of amounting to a good deal more than 1 percent in the near future. Furthermore, 1 percent is a large volume, and, if these goods were produced here, would employ many persons.

I did not rise, however, to point out that matter. My thought was that we already have adopted this policy when we passed the domestic law increasing the cost of production under the N. I. R. A. We are now dealing with another law which is increasing the cost of production; and I repeat we ought to adopt the same policy that we adopted under the N. I. R. A., and incorporate in it an amendment of this kind.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Does the Senator feel that if these agricultural prices are increased, it will be necessary for labor to have increased wages?

Mr. WALSH. I certainly think it will be necessary.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do, too.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, as the Senator knows, I am opposed to the whole A. A. A. legislation.

Mr. TYDINGS. Will not that, in turn, make the man who works in the textile mills even less able to carry on than he is now, when the Senator says that most of these plants are closed?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; he will be less able to carry on, because his domestic market will be reduced; but if this amendment shall be adopted he will be at least protected against cheap foreign labor competing with his own output.

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; but the textile worker will have less money with which to buy the products of agriculture.

Mr. WALSH. That is self-evident.

Mr. TYDINGS. So we meet ourselves coming back again.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Something has been said about the small percentage of increase in the case of some of these importations. They seem to me to be very considerable, and increasing rapidly; but this is a discretionary power which is to be granted. If the increase of importations is not sufficient to justify action, undoubtedly action will not be taken. So it does not seem to me that the question of percentage is important, in view of the fact that the importations are coming in, and we leave with the Executive the power to determine at what point they shall be stopped from coming in.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator is absolutely correct; and it was pointed out in the hearings of protest by the cotton textile industry that were this small percentage of imports from Japan eliminated, many thousands of Americans would be put to work in the textile mills, even if the percentage of our total consumption is small.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, let me give the Senator just one further significant figure from the table by saying that the imports of cotton semimanufactures for the first quarter of 1933 were 1,288,000 pounds. For the comparable quarter of 1935 the imports were 21,000,000 pounds. I insist that it is the trend, it is the direction of the movement, which is so challenging; and we cannot be blind to it if we have the slightest interest in the preservation of American industry and agriculture.

Mr. WALSH. And I will say to the Senator, confirming what he said, that when some figures of increased imports were called to the attention of the President, he actually entered into an agreement with the authorities in Japan to limit and restrict a certain commodity, limiting the importations to the average amount which was imported in previous years.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. WHITE. As bearing on the question of the imports of cotton cloth, I have before me figures which indicate that in the first 5 months of this year, as compared with the first 5 months of last year, the imports rose from 22,806,000 square yards to more than 32,000,000 square yards—an increase of approximately 50 percent.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; I think similar figures were presented by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] earlier in the debate. The Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE] and myself repeatedly introduced figures on the subject earlier in the session.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. While it is true that there has been a considerable increase in cotton-textile imports from Japan——

Mr. WALSH. I am not now complaining about that. I am citing it is an illustration of the need of some protection.

Mr. BARKLEY. The debate has centered around that as an illustration; but, as a matter of fact, taking imports of that sort from the entire world, there has been a decrease from 1928 to 1934 from more than 61,000,000 square yards to about 41,000,000 square yards. The imports from Japan increased from 1,710,000 square yards in 1928 to 7,287,000 square yards in 1934. But there has been a constant decrease over a period of the past 7 years in cotton-textile imports into the United States from the world, which, it seems to me, would indicate that the trouble in the cotton-textile industry is not due to an increase in importations from outside the United States but is due to other conditions which are entirely different from that.

What is the Senator's reaction to that?

Mr. WALSH. It is my opinion that the Japanese importations are a contributing cause, but a minor cause, of the condition of the cotton-textile industry; but it is a situation which is threatening and needs attention. Let me add that I know that the administration has been very, very much concerned and very much troubled about the rapid increase in the importation of cotton textiles of all sorts from Japan.

Mr. BARKLEY. I appreciate that.

Mr. WALSH. And negotiations have been considered for the purpose of seeing if an arrangement could not be made between the two countries which would limit these importations.

Did the Senator from Kentucky see the exhibit of importations from Japan which was displayed in this building a few months ago?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; I am sorry to say I did not. I was busy at the time, and did not go to see it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DUFFY in the chair). The time of the Senator from Massachusetts on the amendment has expired.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I do not want to delay the Senate; I only wish to make my own position clear.

I shall not support the pending amendment. In making that statement, I find no fault with those who do so, because it is a very logical step, with this farm program, to restrict imports, so as not to undermine the philosophy of the A. A. A. set-up.

I feel, however, that no sooner will this amendment be adopted than in the next session of the Congress it will be further necessary to impose an additional restriction by increasing the tariffs on agricultural products, particularly those to which the Senator from Michigan has referred. And as we place restrictions and embargoes and quotas on other agricultural commodities in the United States, of course other countries will place like restrictions upon the commodities which we are selling to them.

We must not lose sight of the fact that somehow or other trade ultimately has to balance. We cannot sell unless we buy. We would drain all the currency of the nations of the world to this country were we to continue to sell everything we could to them and buy nothing in return, because the payments would have to be made in money.

I am going to ask those who are interested in my observations to take heed of the fact that in 1928 prices generally, not only of agricultural products but generally, were the highest they had been for some time. That was before the last tariff act was passed. At that time our exports were, roughly, around five and a half billion dollars a year and our imports were about four and a half billion dollars a year. In other words, we were then selling a greater quantity of goods than we had ever before sold to the world in times of peace; but we were importing a greater quantity of goods than we had ever before imported in times of peace.

Obviously, we could not have sold that volume of goods to the world if we had not bought that volume of goods from the world, because the world used the money it received from selling those goods to us to pay for the goods which we were selling to them, and when we attempted to restrict that situation, regardless of the merit of the method—and I do not wish to argue the philosophy of the tariff at all—when we attempted that, within 14 months, 54 countries of the world adopted similar measures against American goods.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Is it not a fact that the highest point ever reached in exportations from this country was when we had a very high tariff?

Mr. TYDINGS. I cannot recall to what year the Senator refers.

Mr. GORE. The highest point in exports was under the Simmons-Underwood law.

Mr. BORAH. I do not so understand. I understand that our exports in 1929 were greater than at any other time in our history.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maryland yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Idaho is in error. The highest exports were in 1918, 1919, and 1920, when they aggregated between seven and eight billion dollars each year.

Mr. BORAH. That was immediately after the war.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not think those are fair years to take as examples. But let me say that, regardless of what the tariff was or was not—and I do not want to get into a discussion of the tariff—the fact is that I can show that in the year when we exported the most, I do not care what year it was, we also imported the most. We cannot export without importing. The farmer cannot buy a pair of shoes until he takes his eggs or wheat into town and turns the eggs or the wheat into money, and with that money he buys the shoes. Prohibit the farmer from selling his eggs or his wheat, and he cannot buy any shoes. So it is with nations.

Mr. President, this country exports more than it imports. Let us suppose we stopped all trade; who would be the greater loser, the country which sells more to the world than it buys from the world or the country which sells less to the world than it buys from the world?

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President——

Mr. TYDINGS. I cannot yield now; I have only a little time.

I am not finding fault with the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin. As I have said, it is a perfectly logical step; but I believe it is wrong fundamentally; and, as he himself stated, we are going at this thing from the wrong angle.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I will yield briefly; I have only a few minutes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I merely wish to say that it seems to me that the Senator from Maryland is arguing against the fundamental policy involved in the Agricultural Adjustment Act and not against my amendment.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is correct; I have said that. I am not going to vote for the Senator's amendment, because I am not going to vote for the bill. I think the Senator's amendment is but a byproduct of this whole scheme.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

Mr. TYDINGS. I am not reflecting on the Senator. I hope he will let me finish.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will not the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I would rather not, because I should like to make a few observations, and I will try not to draw the Senator into the argument by any other reference to his amendment particularly.

I believe that in 1937 or 1938, at some time along in the future, the job of the Congress is going to be to unscramble this whole situation, and it is going to be a bigger job than any job the Congress has undertaken so far. These are all artificial measures. Obviously, if industry is getting more than it should get in comparison with agricultural prices, then the thing to do is to pull down industry to the level where agriculture can exist on the same parity with industry. If it is wrong, as is claimed by the agriculturists, to put industry on stilts, it is equally wrong to put agriculture on stilts. Gentlemen cannot blow hot and cold.

This does not mean free trade, it does not mean we have to wipe out all tariffs, that we must not take any account of how much is sold and how much is not sold, and what the imports and the exports are between countries.

We had the N. R. A., and what did that do? The N. R. A. put the farmer further below parity than he was before the N. R. A. was established. The fact was recognized at once that the farmer was not getting a fair return for his toil, and one of the first acts passed was one accentuating the unfairness existing between agriculture and industry. Senators voted for it. I think it was wrong, and I myself did not support it. But today the average man who works on a farm on wages, from sunup to sundown, counting his room and board, gets 50 or 60 percent as much as the wage paid to a comparable man in industry, and who has the nerve to do anything about that unfairness? Nobody.

I am not objecting to the laboring man getting all the money he can, but we must not lose sight of the fact that it is possible for him to get into such a situation that great masses of the people are penalized to the amount of every dollar which is above the parity of the man who toils on the farm.

I shall not vote for the pending measure for the reason that I do not believe we are going at the problem which confronts this country in a rational way. There has to be a scaling down of industry. I do not mean that any particular man should be treated unfairly, and I do not mean to say that wages, or this, that, or the other thing must be summarily reduced. What I do say is that the mission of the Congress is not to condone evils by raising up other things to the standard of the evils, but our mission is to bring down those things which are too high, so that all will rest on a good, solid foundation.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. The last National Democratic Convention declared that that was the mission of the Democratic Party, but not a sentence has been written into law in the 3 years the party has been in power looking to that end.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator is correct. What is the condition of the United States today, not only as respects agriculture, but along other lines? Go into the cities of the United States, with their great reservoirs of unemployed. Is it possible to make food cost more and at the same time help the distressed people in the cities, for whom we have just appropriated $4,880,000,000?

Is it possible to make clothing cost more and at the same time help the plight of the man who has descended to the lowest rung of the ladder? The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] and others who are here know that we cannot help the man who is already out of work by adding to the cost of living. We can help him by reducing the cost of living; and, if we do that, we will increase the demand for the necessities of life, taking up the surplus in the market, and difficult and hard though the road is to walk, with all the commitments of the higher price returns which our people have made in the days of prosperity, the high-priced mortgages, and all that; difficult as the road is to walk, in the last analysis, it will be easier than the road we are walking, which is piling one economic monstrosity—I cannot think of a more appropriate word—on top of another economic monstrosity.

At some time—it may be 2 years, 5 years, 10 years off—some day the farmer is going to realize, and the man who works in the city is going to realize, that there is very little difference between getting $3 a day and paying 30 cents a dozen for eggs, and getting $4 a day and paying 40 cents a dozen for eggs. The question of wages should be discussed in comparison with what a man must translate his earnings into in order to live comfortably with his family. So it is with the farmer.

I am not going to vote for this measure because it will further handicap America in competing in the world markets. We have already lost your world markets, though not necessarily because of the depression. We should have lost them in 1920 and 1921 and 1922 had it not been for the fact that we were sending billions of dollars abroad each year in the form of international loans, which the borrowers were using to pay us for the goods they were purchasing in this country. We had 14 or 15 years of the illusion of prosperity. We have always refused—and, in my humble judgment, we refuse today—to face the naked fact that trade ultimately has to balance. We cannot put artificial stilts under or restrictions upon commerce without in the end finding that whatever we have taken away from the other fellow we have taken away from ourselves.

Agriculture comes here with the best case in the world. It has been pilloried upon the public platform and crucified on the cross. Coming, as I do, from an industrial State, while I have committed my sins, I believe the RECORD will show that no man in this body representing an industrial State has voted for as much low tariff as have I.

In fact, I believe there is only one item which might be a subject of question in this body in all the items of the tariff acts to which I have given my support.

I know that in the end industry cannot live, any more than agriculture can live, if we continue to run this country out of line, as it has been run since 1920, first with the Emergency Tariff Act, then with the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act, and then with the international loans which gave us the deception of prosperity.

Mr. President, I am not going to support this bill, because I believe its whole trend is against the logic and the force of events. I believe it violates every economic principle which can be safely used to conduct a nation's affairs. In not voting for it, however, I am not criticising those who offer this amendment, who support it, and who feel that the only way they can get a measure of justice for their people, who are entitled to equal protection, is to do this thing, wrong though it may eventually prove to be as time unfolds itself.

With that observation as to the reason why I shall not support this measure, I shall say no more in criticism of it.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Does the Senator concede that in justice and in right a man may commit murder in self-defense?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes. I think that is a pretty good defense.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That is the reason why I shall support this bill.

Mr. BAILEY. One cannot commit murder in self-defense. It cannot be done.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I do not attempt to make any argument in regard to the tariff. I think the only grounds in the world upon which tariff arguments were based have entirely changed.

Nearly every country has proceeded to depreciate its currency for the particular purpose of securing foreign trade. Japan has a very peculiar system. Japan really has two currencies. For the purpose of buying abroad, she is tied to the pound sterling. For the purpose of employing labor at home, she has a very much inflated domestic currency which passes at par.

That situation exists more or less throughout the world. Therefore, it is impossible at the present time for us to use the checks and balances which we use under normal conditions.

Whether or not this process of raising the purchasing power of our people is right, undoubtedly it is right to attempt to increase the purchasing power of our people. I believe it is right to attempt to increase their consumptive power. It is right to increase it in any way we see fit.

We all admit that the laws under which we are now operating, called the "new deal", are emergency laws, and are entirely artificial; and yet it has not been suggested what we should adopt in their place. We operated under natural laws, we will assume, in 1930 and in 1931 and a part of 1933, and undoubtedly in 1932; but under those natural laws by March 1, 1933, we had reached the point of bankruptcy of every bank in the United States; at least, we were so told. That condition might have finally meant the bankruptcy of our Government. Then we should have had total bankruptcy everywhere.

If we have nothing else to suggest, if we are not to have anything artificial to stimulate what was then almost a dead government and a dead people, we have the laissez faire Government of the past. Liquidation was the theory of the administration which preceded the present one. Under it there were foreclosures, bank failures, liquidations down to the very point of death. Certainly none of us desires to go back to such a condition. We are in an artificial era.

I cannot conceive how anyone, even though he were the most ardent free trader under the natural conditions which preceded the war, could now be a free trader. I cannot conceive how anyone today would be willing to allow the living conditions in this country to sink to the level of those in Japan; yet the ultimate answer to the question is that if we let nature take its course, we shall sink to that level.

I believe in holding high in this country the standard of living of every class of people, higher than anywhere in the world, no matter how we do it, even if we have to build a Chinese wall around this country. I would rather do that than have us sink to the level of the people of some of the countries of the world at the present time.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator permit me to insert a fact? The wages paid textile workers in Japan, on the average, come to 23½ cents a day. In America at the present time textile workers are earning 30 cents an hour. Japan is shipping textile goods into this country.

Mr. PITTMAN. As I stated before, Japan has her money tied to the pound sterling for purchases abroad. Her money used for purchases at home is an inflated currency. As the Senator from North Carolina said, the wage paid a Japanese textile worker is about 23 cents a day.

Mr. BAILEY. Unless we take steps to stop the shipping of textile goods into this country the inevitable consequence will be the depression of the wages of the textile workers in America.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I shall yield a little later.

Mr. TYDINGS. I desire to reply to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. PITTMAN. I shall try to get through in time to permit the Senators to have their colloquy.

I have the highest admiration for the distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], who is in charge of this bill. I admire his persistency in standing for his principle of free trade no matter whether or not the whole world changes. It is a magnificent persistency. Take the case of cotton, for instance: The people of this country are being taxed for the purpose of maintaining an artificial price for cotton. They are not only being taxed to reduce the production of cotton but they are being taxed to support those who have been taken off the land by reason of the reduction of cotton cultivation. Not only that, but the labor of this country is bearing all its part of the burden of taxation for the benefit of the cotton planter, to support those who are put off the land, and for the benefit of the artificial price.

The same thing is true in the case of wheat. Of course, the Senator from Maryland is opposed to the whole system. I may be opposed to the whole system, but I am not discussing the system. I am discussing the absolute necessity of placing a wall around this country if nothing but a wall will protect what we are trying to do.

Of course, the cotton planter is not worrying about that. The cotton planter is the largest exporter we have. When we come down to every other farmer in the country, however, when we come down to the man who is working in a mill, the condition is different. I do not think over 40 percent of mill capacity is operating today in this country. Was it our idea to increase the capacity of those mills to 100 percent so that they could hire labor? I think it was our intention to do that. It is our intention now to do it.

If we do not have production, it is totally immaterial what the price is. The production of our factories today is only about 40 percent of normal. We cannot increase that production if we allow Japanese manufactured goods or the manufactured goods from any other country to flood the United States. We might as well face that situation if we intend to increase production. If we are to limit our production in this country, it is totally immaterial whether or not we let those goods come in.

I say now to the Senate that I am not in favor of lowering the standard of living in this country to the level that it has reached in other countries, no matter what artificial means may be necessary to protect it.

I desire also to have the value of farm products raised to the level of the price of products of industry in this country. I am hopeful that that may be accomplished without dragging down the standards of agriculture. I would rather attempt to lift the farmer than to drag down industry. I cannot conceive that industry can be dragged down unless the standards of living are also lowered. I am willing to try, by every possible means, to raise the standard of agriculture before I take steps by my vote to degrade, reduce, and break down the conditions of industry. I think that is possible. I would go as far as the Senator from North Carolina suggested we go, and I would rather go there now. So far as the basic agricultural commodities are concerned, I would not allow agricultural products to come in from any country in the world until we had restored the normal production in this country. That is all I have to say.

Mr. SCHALL. I ask unanimous consent to read my speech on the pending bill through the eyes of the clerk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BARKLEY. In the absence of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], I ask the Senator to postpone his request for the time being.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I inquire what was the statement of the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. SCHALL. The Senator from Kentucky wants the Senator from Arkansas to censor my remarks.

Mr. BARKLEY. I was asking the Senator from Minnesota to withhold his request until the return of the Senator from Arkansas. I do not know that there will be any objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BARKLEY. I reserve the right to object. So far as I am concerned, I have no objection to the reading of the Senator's speech; but, in the absence of the Senator from Arkansas, I think it ought to be stated that, if consent is to be given, the right to object to any portion of the speech shall be reserved as the reading progresses.

Mr. McNARY. That has been the declaration heretofore.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator from Minnesota will yield long enough for me to ask the Senator from Wisconsin a question? I merely want some enlightenment on his amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SCHALL. I yield.

Mr. BONE. If my memory serves me aright, the National Industrial Recovery Act contains a provision which authorizes the President, through the Tariff Commission, to prevent dumping operations on the part of foreign governments. Is that correct?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is correct.

Mr. BONE. Can the Senator from Wisconsin advise me whether such prohibition extends to farm commodities, or is it restricted to industrial commodities?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is my assumption that it was restricted to commodities affected by the National Industrial Recovery Act, but I confess that I have not recently surveyed that situation.

My interest in this matter was prompted by the fact that the House committee incorporated a provision similar to the one which I am offering, and, after looking into the situation confronting us growing out of the alarming rate of increase in the importations of commodities affected by the Agricultural Adjustment Act, I felt it was imperative that some such power should be delegated.

Mr. BONE. Of course, where we are attempting to protect the consumption of our own products in this country that would partly be thwarted unless there were some definite control of imports.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is correct; and, even if the terms of the National Industrial Recovery Act were broad enough to include agriculture, I would favor, in view of the emergency, including such a provision in this bill, and to that extent indicate the sentiment of the Congress that urgent necessity requires this action be taken.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Minnesota if he will yield to me for only a few moments, because what I have to say relates to the discussion which has been under way during the last hour or so. I will occupy the time for only a few minutes.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I inquire if the remarks of the Senator from Oklahoma will be taken out of my time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; they will be taken out of the time of the Senator from Oklahoma. The Senator from Minnesota will have the floor at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. SCHALL. And the other remarks will not be taken out of my time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The statement of the Senator from Oklahoma will not be taken out of the time of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SCHALL. I am not inquiring as to the remarks of the Senator from Washington and the Senator from Wisconsin.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Minnesota will begin when the reading of his remarks commences.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BARKLEY. The same time limitation will apply to an address read by the clerk as if the Senator from Minnesota delivered it in person?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky has made a correct statement.

Mr. SCHALL. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin is logically consistent with the pending bill. Indeed, rigorous consistency would demand its adoption if we are to follow this scheme to the ends of the earth, if we are to follow this theory to its logical conclusion—and we will probably do that one day. I appreciate the inconsistency of limiting farm products at home and importing the same kind of farm products from abroad. I appreciate the inconsistency of permitting foreign-grown farm products to come into this country when the Government is trying by artificial means to raise, maintain, and peg the prices of domestic agricultural products. Theoretically, that would be an absurdity in the midst of such a program. Practically, it would perhaps be an absurdity but for the drought which occurred last year. I think that, to a large extent, the condition of which Senators have been complaining this morning, particularly the increase in the importations of foreign agricultural products, has been due, in large measure, to the unexampled drought which occurred last year.

I realize, however, that the pending amendment should challenge the support of all Senators who believe that trade is a curse and not a blessing. I think it ought to receive the support of all Senators who think that foreign commerce ought to be prohibited and that its prohibition would contribute to national prosperity.

This is one of the penalties of embarking upon a plan which involves a resort to artificial forces to control natural forces and to suspend or repeal the fundamental laws of economics. We are caught in a cataract which we cannot govern and cannot resist. It reminds me of an old saying, that "he who rides a tiger sometimes has trouble in dismounting."

We have embarked upon that experiment. Other peoples in other ages have embarked upon the same experiment, and with one uniform and unfailing result—defeat and ofttimes disaster. But, undaunted souls, not intimidated by the warnings and lessons of experience, once more we have adventured upon the impossible, and I repeat that those who are attempting the impossible ought in advance to calculate upon a substantial percentage of failure.

I recall that the Yellow River in China has been leveed and diked for centuries and centuries past. The floodwaters have from time to time deposited silt at the bottom of the stream, necessitating the heightening of the levees and the dikes, and when that was done more silt was deposited, requiring a further heightening of the dams and the levees and the dikes. Today, Mr. President, there are stretches of that river where the bottom of the stream is 10 feet above the tops of the houses. Perhaps that was not expected in the beginning, but it accounts for the unbridled disasters which occur in China and which, from time to time, overwhelm and destroy her hapless millions of people. I do not mean that we ought to be warned by that example, even by analogy. Let us repeat the blunder and learn that lesson for ourselves. Let us pay the tuition which is required to learn once again what all history teaches.

I do not know whether in the debate this morning the tragic element or the comic element predominated. In some respects it was vaudeville, and the acting was superb. It was a parade of scarecrows. Some Senators were duly affrighted; their acting was perfect. It was a ghost dance that challenged admiration.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], always a master of his subject, always familiar with the facts and the statistics required to sustain his conclusions, unfortunately this morning had a lapse of memory or possibly a missing page in his notes. He could not remember the percentages. The percentages slipped through a slot in his memory. But after all, he said, percentages were not significant; they were of no consequence; they taught no lesson that we need to learn. The Senator said it is the trend that counts—"it is the trend that counts"—and the trend is known to him and to us and we ought to be duly shocked and we ought to take warning. Let us see.

The Senator said that during the first 3 months of this year we have actually imported 7,000,000 bushels of corn—7,000,000 bushels of corn! He does not know what the percentage is, but he does know that 7,000,000 bushels of corn count even in this age of billions. Seven million bushels of corn in the first quarter! If that enormous influx of corn should continue during the remainder of the year, it would rise to the staggering total of 28,000,000 bushels of corn. Contemplate 28,000,000 bushels of corn!

Our corn crop last year, in spite of the drought, was 1,600,000,000 bushels. It was little more than half a crop. Ordinarily we produce between two and one-half billion and 3,000,000,000 bushels of corn. One year the crop topped 3,000,000,000 bushels. Two and one-half billion bushels is around the average. Two and one-half billion bushels of corn. Yet the Senator from Michigan takes fright because, forsooth, 28,000,000 bushels of corn may invade the American market during the current year. We have had many disasters, but that threatens to be the worst of them all. [Laughter.]

The Senator said we have imported during the first 3 months of this year 16,000,000 pounds of canned meat. It sounds big. He does not know what the percentage is or what is the percentage of increase. Sixteen million pounds of canned meat in the first quarter. At that rate it would be 64,000,000 during the year—hardly enough to serve one meal for the American people. Yet the Senator takes fright that in a country where 10,000,000 people are hungry one imported meal might wreck the destinies of the Republic.

How much beef did the Government slaughter last year in the United States? It was 4,900,000,000 pounds. Now we are getting into the right altitude. We are getting up into billions now. [Laughter.] The packers slaughtered last year 6,900,000,000 pounds of beef not including veal. Yet the Senator fears that a hungry people may be ruined by the importation of a little more than 60,000,000 pounds of canned meats. We have resisted a good many enemies in the past, but we may not be able to live down the importation of 64,000,000 pounds of corned beef.

The pork we slaughtered last year, I believe, aggregated 15,500,000,000 pounds and all the meat of all kinds imported this year into the United States would not feed all the American people 1 day—not 1 day.

We cannot reach sound conclusions on this subject unless and until we take percentages into account.

Mr. President, when we import this trifling amount of canned meat how is it paid for? The chances are that American cotton raised in Mississippi or Oklahoma paid for this canned meat. Have the farmers who produce a surplus amount of cotton no right to dispose of their surplus in the markets of the world? Last year the consumption of foreign-grown cotton increased in foreign countries 1,676,000 bales and more, while the foreign consumption of American grown cotton decreased last year 1,951,000 bales, almost bale for bale. There is a "baleful" warning to the cotton growers of the country, to the cotton growers of the South, a "baleful" warning to every section of this country whose prosperity depends in any measure upon the prosperity of the cotton farmers of the South.

Japan has shipped a few consignments of cotton goods into the United States. For centuries Japan was known as a hermit nation. She had no intercourse with the outside world. We sent a flotilla to Japan to compel her to unlock her gates and to establish communication with the outside world. Was Japan after all wise when she assumed and maintained the character of a hermit nation? Are we now disposed to emulate an example which we compelled Japan to abandon?

The cotton goods imported into this country this year from Japan, if the current rate continues, I believe will be less than 1 percent of our domestic production. Japan is the largest purchaser of American-grown cotton. She takes annually 1,500,000 bales. One year she took 1,700,000 bales. Japan today, I believe, is buying more cotton from the United States than England, France, and Germany combined. She buys cotton from the farmers of Oklahoma and Texas. How does she pay for it? How can she pay for it? In gold. She can pay for it in gold if she has the gold, or she can pay for our raw cotton with her cotton fabrics if we will let her make the trade. If we refuse to trade with her, if we close our gates to keep her cotton goods out of this country, then and there we close our gates to keep our raw cotton in this country. That truth is not only self-evident, but it is indisputable.

Japan's total exports during the whole of last year, measured in terms of gold, was about $300,000,000, equivalent to our export trade during 3 months in terms of gold. Yet the Senator takes fright lest Japan should overwhelm the United States with cotton fabrics manufactured out of raw cotton grown in our Southern States.

I do not know whether it would be equally effective, but how would it serve to stop exporting cotton to Japan altogether and pile up our surplus of domestic cotton and force her to look to other quarters for raw material which our farmers can furnish and should furnish?

Mr. President, we export 40 percent of all the tobacco grown in this country. Have not our tobacco growers a right to their farm market? Have not they a right to sell their surplus abroad? How can we sell abroad unless we buy abroad? How can the foreign customer of our tobacco pay for the tobacco he buys? In sooth, he can pay in gold if he has the gold. But he has not got the gold. We have got the gold already. He can pay for our tobacco with his goods if we will accept the goods. He cannot pay at all if we will not accept his goods. It may be that cotton cloth which came into this country from Japan was made out of cotton grown in North Carolina and came back home to pay for tobacco grown in North Carolina. Should we stop that trade? Should we stop that transaction? If we should, we would impair not only the prosperity of the tobacco States but the prosperity of every other State which is dependent in any measure upon the prosperity of the tobacco States.

Mr. President, we export 40 percent, or we used to export 40 percent, of all the packing-house lard produced in this country. Has not the corn and hog farmer a right to the foreign markets for his surplus corn and lard? How can the foreigner buy our lard unless we accept his goods in exchange? How can he pay for American lard except with his own goods? Of course, gold would be acceptable, but gold is not available. We must take his goods if we wish to dispose of our goods. There is no other choice, except to trade or not to trade. Every section that is dependent at all upon the prosperity of the Corn Belt for its own prosperity shares the dependence of the Corn Belt upon a foreign outlet for its surplus output.

It may be that the canned beef, which so much appalled the Senator from Michigan, came into this country from the Argentine in direct payment for lard produced in Illinois. It paid for American goods of some description.

Mr. President, from 1921 to 1933 our exports of semimanufactured goods declined 42 percent. Our exports of finished manufactured goods declined 62 percent. Our exports of foodstuffs, as I now recall, declined 93 percent. Our farmers have almost lost their foreign market as it is. Are Senators content with the economic consequences? Is foreign trade a one-way traffic? Can we sell our surpluses abroad and buy nothing from our customers abroad? Foreign commerce, after all, is barter, in the last analysis.

Sir, we have got to trade our way out of this trouble. We have got to trade our way out if we ever get out. Unfortunately that way is no longer a highway. I sometimes fear that we are marking time and not marching; that we are going around and around and not going forward.

What would be thought of the man who, trapped in a burning house, would deliberately lock the door and throw the key into the flames?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Oklahoma on the amendment has expired. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL] has the floor. The clerk will read the speech of the Senator from Minnesota.

The legislative clerk proceeded to read the speech, and read as follows:

TEN REASONS FOR ENDING THE A. A. A.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, there are at least 10 outstanding and fundamental reasons for ending at this session of Congress the "brain trust" plan, borrowed from Russia, for Federal domination of agriculture by theorists and politicians under the first new-deal failure called A. A. A.

First. In its effect on American agriculture, our one-time leading basic industry, the A. A. A. has destroyed more crops and livestock than drouth, flood, bugs, and disease combined, and undermined the work of the Nation for the past 70 years in promoting agriculture as the economic base of our Republic. As a false and sinister farm builder, the A. A. A. has done more to demoralize agriculture, more to destroy the progress of our 50,000,000 rural population than all previous disasters combined.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I interrupt for a moment? I wish to ask the Senator from Minnesota a question. He is criticizing the A. A. A. I wonder whether he would vote to repeal the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I do not wish to have my time taken up by a speech by another Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am asking the Senator from Minnesota a question.

Mr. SCHALL. The Senator may ask it after the conclusion of my speech.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I prefer to ask it now.

Mr. SCHALL. I do not wish to be shut off by interruptions. I refuse to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota declines to yield. The clerk will continue to read the speech.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, was a reservation made about the reading of this speech? If the Senator from Minnesota will not answer a civil question——

Mr. SCHALL. I am very glad to answer questions, but already time has been taken up. I shall be very glad to answer questions, but I do not want my time consumed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would come in the Senator's time; so the clerk will proceed with the reading of the speech.

The legislative clerk resumed the reading of the speech, and read as follows:

Second. In 100 courts of the land, the equity injunctions granted by United States District Courts and Circuit Courts of Appeal, following the decisions of the United States Supreme Court in the petroleum and "sick chicken" cases, are a forecast of the reasonable certainty of the end of the A. A. A. before this year ends. Why should Members of Congress demonstrate, in the face of these multiplying and just decisions, their individual incapacity and untrustworthiness as representatives of the people by casting their votes for this outstanding fraud and failure? Why try to fool the people with pretense and hullabaloo?

Third. The demonstrations of its economic failure are outstanding, as shown by the application to leading staple crops, for example:

(a) The Chicago price of wheat in July 1933, when the A. A. A. first was applied to the wheat crop, was $1.20. Today it is 83 cents—a drop of 37 cents per bushel, and the purchase price today is in a dollar worth 59 cents.

(b) The American cotton industry has lost more in 2 years of the new deal than it had gained in 20 years of normal agricultural development. Half the cotton export trade is gone, and 40 percent of the former cotton hands are on public doles.

(c) We have lost, for the first time in a half-century, our proud position as the world's leading agricultural Nation, and are today reduced to the position of importers of all the principal food products.

(d) In its effect on unemployment, which was called our national "emergency", the A. A. A. in its crop-curtailment and idleness-producing activities has added at least 1,500,000 and from that to 2,000,000 to the army of unemployed, and placed perhaps twice that number of people on public doles.

Fourth. In destroying and reducing crops and livestock, the A. A. A. has crippled both domestic and foreign trade, and undermined one of the chief sources of railroad traffic and employment, with the result that American railways today are at the lowest ebb of their prosperity in 50 years.

Fifth. In undermining agriculture and reducing the crops that pay for industrial goods, the A. A. A. has cut down the world's greatest market—the American home market—for all the productions of the factory, forest, and mine, and thereby cut down the country's entire business index since July 1933 by more than 15 percent, during a period when competing countries, as Canada and Great Britain, have risen 25 percent.

Sixth. In its direct effect on the industries, A. A. A. processing taxes of $900,000,000 have cut down both the production and the employment of all industries processing the products of agriculture, or over one-half the manufacturing industries of the United States, curtailing their output, destroying their export trade, and by increasing American production costs the A. A. A. has benefited all competing countries which have sent here a record flood of foreign imports.

Seventh. Invasion of the powers of the States over intrastate industries and trade by the A. A. A., as noted by all the courts of the land, threatens the basic structure of our Government, the constitutional guaranty of a republican form of government to each of the sovereign States. The A. A. A. is an ever-threatening menace to our boast of the century that ours is "an indissoluble Union of indestructible States."

Eighth. The A. A. A. undermines the powers of Congress in two directions:

(a) The $900,000,000 of process taxes levied and collected by the A. A. A. usurp the chief function of Congress, the tax power granted in article I.

(b) The domination of agriculture by a system of Federal commands and subsidies destroys the fundamental relation between the people of the respective States and their representatives, the A. A. A. taking the place of the 531 legislative representatives, and usurping the legislative function in all that concerns agriculture.

Ninth. The A. A. A. violates the Constitution in at least three activities:

(a) It assumes to take over the tax power of the legislative branch of government.

(b) It assumes to take over the control of intrastate commerce and industry, belonging to the respective States.

(c) It usurps all legislative functions of government relating to the fundamental industry of every country, the supply of food and clothing.

Tenth. The A. A. A. destroys the human foundation of the Republic, an independent and self-reliant agricultural yeomanry, the foundation of liberty and of all American institutions since the day when our "plowmen fired the shot heard 'round the world."

Gentlemen of the Senate, the end of the A. A. A. is at hand. It is false in principle—that scarcity means plenty. It has neither pride of ancestry nor hope of posterity. It is a sicker bird than the "sick chicken" which the Supreme Court buried, with nine Justices out of nine as pall bearers. It came from Russia. It is time it was deported to Russia. We want no regime of Russian peasantry and Moscow autocrats in America. If we are still Americans we should lose no time in seizing this opportunity to show our faith in the old American creed that "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty."

Our oaths to support and uphold the Constitution are sufficient to guide our respective votes. Unless any in Congress were elected on the Socialist or Communist platforms of 1932, we can do naught else but vote "nay" on this A. A. A. expansion bill, forced upon us against the provisions of our Bill of Rights.

PURPOSE OF THE NEW DEAL

Mr. President, the main objective of the so-called "new deal", here as abroad, is now apparent, both from the words of the main actors and from the character of the measures they are putting through under gag rule or attempting to put across. Even the United States Supreme Court, in its decision of May 27 on the "sick chicken" case of N. I. R. A., has fairly summarized the new deal as guilty of the following unlawful aims, namely, centralized Federal autocracy invading the powers of the States, unlawfully dominating their major industries, and unlawfully usurping the powers of Congress.

Differences between the new deals here and abroad appear in the main these:

First. The ends which are achieved over there by force of arms are achieved here by force of subsidy. The $5,000,000,000 "Big Bertha" obtained by the President for his 1936 campaign has a far greater and more deadly range in controlling his subjects than all the guns of Mussolini's black shirts and Adolph Hitler's brown-shirted shock troops.

Second. The socialistic-communistic measures drafted by the White House for taking over farm control, factory control, federalizing the banks and railways, and electrocuting the utilities—bills drafted by Frankfurter, Corcoran, Cohen & Co., who, it appears, never read the Constitution or even practiced law—are put over here by gag law without reading, whereas over there the parliaments do not waste their time with useless make-believe, and vote "yea" without gagging.

Prof. Rexford Guy Tugwell, known in Russia as "Comrade Tugwell" and here as "Brain Truster No. 1", has defined the new deal in one paragraph of his 21-page address, now printed and distributed by this administration as a public document, when he describes it as follows:

"Government of men" in place of the 148-year-old "fiction" of "government of laws", which began under the Constitution of 1787.

Even the boys and girls in the public schools know that "government of men" means autocratic rule, unhampered by a Constitution, or by a Congress elected by the people. Such governments as Rome had under its dictators from the time of Fabius Maximus and Sulla down to Pompey and Crassus and the 17 Caesars, such governments as emperors and oligarchic central bureaus gave over their miserable subjects from the time of the Dark Ages down to the modern war lords, are today pictured under the new-deal dictatorship of Mussolini, Hitler, and Joseph Stalin.

This "government of men", says Comrade Tugwell, in his 21-page address delivered before a "science and arts club" in New York, November 16, 1933, sent out under Government frank, is what we have had here since March 4, 1933.

Says Comrade Tugwell, on page 19 of this Government document:

> I have had a chance to see the truth of the saying that ours is a government of men. The fiction that it is a government of laws would, I think, never have attained its great prestige if the right men had been called to govern.

So such Presidents as Washington and Jefferson, Madison and Monroe, Jackson and Lincoln, Cleveland and Theodore Roosevelt, Woodrow Wilson and Calvin Coolidge, were not the "right men", and such Secretaries of State as Jefferson and Randolph, John Quincy Adams and Henry Clay, Daniel Webster and Edward Everett, Seward and Washburne, Evarts and Blaine, Sherman and Root, Bryan and Kellogg, were not at all the right statesmen.

Moreover, according to the gospel of the new deal, as taught by Comrade Tugwell, such Speakers of the House as Muhlenberg and Dayton, Clay and Blaine, Randall and Carlisle, Crisp and Champ Clark, under whom no 50-page bill drafted by the White House was ever put through without reading or debate, and without even printing, within the space of 45 minutes, were not the right men. They held to the old-fashioned idea of the Constitution based on government of laws.

Furthermore, such jurists as Chief Justice John Marshall and Justices Story, Curtis, Field, Chase, Fuller, White, Holmes, and Chief Justice Charles Evans Hughes were not the right men, because they, so Tugwell suspected, stood for government of laws under a Constitution adopted by the American people and ratified by State legislatures, and which Constitution we and he, before taking office, must swear to uphold and defend.

The "right men" in Tugwell's view are Franklin D. Roosevelt, Raymond Moley, "General" Johnson, Barney Baruch, Morgenthau, Jr., Vincent Astor, Ickes and Wallace, Hopkins and Richberg, and likewise those gifted jurists who draft the new-deal measures—Frankfurter, Corcoran, Cohen & Co.—whose bills, or sugar-coated pills, are swallowed by a go-and-get-it Congress under gag rule like a dose of castor oil. But General Johnson now advises the administration to do away with the "magic-box deal."

"Everything depends on men", says Tugwell in this new-deal public document. And such men they are! There is not a tried statesman, not a real lawyer, not a well-known economist, business man, or financier in the whole brainless "brain trust." They are not even full-fledged professors; just a bunch of ex-assistant professors and tutors who lost their temporary jobs until picked up by Franklin Roosevelt and James Aloysius Farley and financed by Vincent Astor, the millionaire clubman who runs the flagship Nourmahal when Roosevelt plays Ike Walton.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. REYNOLDS in the chair). The time of the Senator on the amendment has expired.

Mr. SCHALL. I will take my time on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will continue the reading.

The legislative clerk resumed the reading, and read as follows:

The "brain trusters" were all picked up within a stone's throw of "Hide-away" Park, Wall Street, and Tammany Hall. As "bold experimenters", they are paper imitators, prattling parrots, of the new deals invented by Carl Marx and Nicolai Lenin, and put across by Mussolini, Hitler, and Joseph Stalin.

One of the numerous false pretenses of the "brain trust" and its administration is that it had a "mandate" from the people. If that is so, where and when did they get it? Not a word of it appears in the Chicago platform of the Democratic Party in 1932. Not a word of it was mentioned in any of the preelection speeches of the President and his propaganda. Not a sign of it appeared until the "new dealers" jumped into the saddle March 4, 1933.

The Democratic platform of 1932 called for the opposite policies. It demanded "strict and impartial enforcement of the antitrust laws to prevent monopoly", and then, after election, under the N. R. A., the administration suspended the antitrust laws entirely, and put over the N. R. A., a staff of high-powered monopolists on the President's "advisory board."

The Chicago platform demanded a Federal Budget annually balanced, and the "new dealers" have piled up Treasury deficits aggregating $12,000,000,000, and have fired Budget Director Lewis Douglas because he insisted upon balancing the Budget.

The Chicago platform demanded cutting down the Federal bureaus and reducing Federal expenditures by not less than 25 percent. The administration has created more new bureaus than all peace-time Presidents of the United States from Washington and Jefferson down—a total of 57 bureaus, equalling Heinz's pickle barrel—and have increased the cost of government to such a point that 1 month of Franklin D. Roosevelt equals the cost of a full year under Theodore Roosevelt, and the world record has been passed in peace-time creation of bureaucratic jobs, debt, deficits, and tax requirements.

The Chicago platform, and indeed the President's inaugural message, demanded "a sound currency at all hazards." Within 90 days after that inaugural pledge, the "new dealers" destroyed the gold standard, demonetized gold, took away gold redemption from all currency, and even bonds, and depreciated the dollar to a fluctuating and uncertain value around 59 cents.

There was one platform in 1932, however, that demanded two-thirds of the program now known as the "new deal", and that was the Socialist platform on which Norman Thomas ran.

There was another platform—the Communist platform, on which Foster ran—which likewise called for much of the new deal, and particularly the Soviet program of the 6 "Delaware holding companies", which 4 members of Roosevelt's Cabinet and 8 of his bureau chiefs, about the time of Tugwell's address, incorporated in Delaware under royal Federal charters to give their 6 Socialist-Communist corporations "perpetual existence", with all the powers of the Soviet General Council over industry.

These two platforms—the Socialist and Communist—borrowed their programs from Carl Marx and Lenin, and from the present Moscow socialistic-communistic model, and the total vote of the candidates of these two parties in 1932 aggregated less than 800,000, or 2 percent of the total popular vote.

And that is the sole semblance of a mandate from the people to this "brain trust", and for the passage of the new-deal bills drafted by Frankfurter, Corcoran, Cohen, et al., pursuant to the prescription of "Comrade", or Dr. Rexford Guy Tugwell—who now sits in the President's weekly Cabinet meeting.

Under this "mandate", or autosuggestion, the administration has had drafted by Frankfurter, Corcoran, Cohen & Co., and passed by an obedient Congress—frequently without a House reading of the bills, and with little or no debate under gag law—something like 60 new-deal measures, largely measures demanded by the Socialist and Communist platforms, notwithstanding the opposite historic views expressed in the platforms of the major parties holding seats in the Senate and House.

The unconstitutional N. R. A., the doubtful paternalism, and processing taxes of the A. A. A., the dole-distributing C. W. A. and F. E. R. A., the White House tariff making, the demonetization of gold, the electrocution of utilities, the proposals to Federalize and centralize the banks and railways as in Russia, the Rayburn Act placing all communications under Federal direction, including autocratic radio, control of telephone, telegraph, and press-dispatch stations, and the score of N. R. A. codes dominating the press and all press machinery and facilities—these are samples of the Fascist-Soviet program of "planned economy", "planned emergency", and "planned chaos."

Three outstanding features of this new deal here are conspicuous in the new deals over in Italy and Russia:

First. The centralized Federal Government invades and overrides the rights and powers of the constituent states.

Mussolini abolished 700 Provinces and municipalities and made them all answer directly to his mandate. Hitler did likewise when he abolished the constitution of Germany. The Soviet usurped all the powers of the constituent Union of Soviet Socialist Republic states.

That is one of the grounds on which the N. R. A. was pronounced unconstitutional by the United States Supreme Court on May 27, 1935. But substantially all of the characteristic new-deal acts do the same thing—they override the power of the respective 48 States as to intrastate commerce, industry, railways, banks, utilities, labor and wages, police powers, and even agriculture.

Partly this Fabian deal has been accomplished by "rubber stamp" law, partly by Executive orders, or edict law, and partly by direct doles or subsidies distributed in billions. Franklin Roosevelt has issued more edict law than all other Presidents combined, and distributed more doles.

Second. Control of the legislative branch of Government by the executive, usurpation of the legislative functions by the President, a combined autocracy of executive and legislative functions—enabling the Executive to vote to himself the appropriations he will spend—is characteristic of the Mussolini, Hitler, and Soviet regimes. This usurpation of legislative power by the Executive is one of the major grounds named by the Supreme Court on May 27 for knocking out the N. R. A. "unconstitutional delegation of legislative powers to the President."

Tariff making by the White House, the processing taxes levied by the A. A. A., the power to grab $5,000,000,000 for his 1936 emergency, are familiar aspects of the same autocratic centralization of the powers of government, including "allocation" of appropriations.

Third. After Mussolini, Hitler, and the Soviet Council had demolished, first, the national parliaments, and, second, the constituent states and local democratic municipalities, they then proceeded, or at one and the same time proceeded, to abolish the bill of rights, freedom of speech and worship, free assembly, and a free press. This was accomplished through a drastic national censorship and a centralized federal propaganda—a resumption of the licensed printing of the Stuart tyranny against which John Milton protested 300 years ago.

That is precisely the program attempted by the "new dealers" here, though not as yet with the success the "brain trust" may have hoped. The N. R. A. codes, aimed at press control, have been nullified by action of the Supreme Court. The Rayburn Communications Act has been a vast handicap to freedom of press dispatches, and has been the means of Federal interference with radio talks, but the administration has not as yet dared to exercise in full the powers of censorship which it has voted to itself by the aid of a go-and-get-it Congress.

Supplementing a too-evident Federal censorship, the Government has built up the most gigantic publicity machine known to history at the cost of scores of millions of dollars. Every economic department in Washington has been resolved into a machine for political propaganda. The Government Printing Office gets out little except propaganda, printed as public documents.

The departments and bureaus have been loaded down with newspaper men—more newspaper reporters, editors, and special writers than all other professions combined. The President, his family, the Cabinet, the "brain trust", are writing books, filling the screens, and are on the radio day after day.

Possibly $200,000,000 may be a conservative estimate of the publicity costs of the new-deal administration annually—salaries for publicity jobs, bureaus that are nothing but propaganda-machines "information" bureaus in all departments, new-deal dope by tons and carloads, radio, moving picture, press hand-outs, flooding the press and mails, "key men" in every section, fixed data from every bureau and department, newspaper and magazine write ups, baby-bond propaganda, 57 bureau propaganda machines, "fireside chats", 1,000 special articles daily, thousands of pictures, hundreds of books, mimeographs by the hundred million—all to fool the American people into swapping off the American Republic and all the principles for which we have worked and fought for 150 years, and deserting our Constitution to accept the worst that Europe has to offer—and all at the expense of the taxpayers—a highly rouged and lipsticked dictatorship of enthroned and blatant ignorance to which Europe itself cannot point with "pride of lawful ancestry or hope of lawful posterity."

Shall we play the hairy Esau to this new-deal Jacob? Shall we sell our birthright for a ride on Aaron's golden calf?

This thing called "new deal", Senators will find, if they will consult any recent Treasury daily statement, has an accumulated "emergency fund" now mounting to the unheard-of height of $18,000,000,000. The cost of government since the Republic began, over a period of 128 years down to the second term of Wilson's administration, including five wars, was far less than this administration has spent in the last two and a half years.

When the expected allocation of five billion more to the President next year has been allotted, and the cost of government is added, the grand total sum for his administration will figure out to be $37,000,000,000, a billion over one and a half times the cost of all the 35 administrations, including the first term of Wilson, which included five wars.

This vast spending orgy is the equivalent of 7 years of tax collections and all other sources of Federal revenue. Seven years of revenue is spent to subsidize the Nation.

If any business corporation were in that condition of insolvency, it would be thrown into the hands of a receiver on application of the stockholders to the court.

I am wondering if that application may not be filed before the Supreme Court of all, the 40,000,000 registered electors, who assemble in the November term of 1936, and I am wondering if our king will not meanwhile find the means, under his program of planned chaos and destruction, through the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, to prevent that decision.

WHEN THE KING DOES WRONG

Mr. President, it has been pointed out repeatedly in the course of this debate, that the provision denying the right of a citizen to appeal to the courts for redress is founded on that old doctrine of the Dark Ages, that—

The King can do no wrong.

In an age, as Senator BORAH put it the other day, when everything the kings did was wrong—down to the levy of imperial taxes, the taking of life, liberty, and property, inquisition and imprisonment, denial of free speech, assembly, and freedom of worship—it became necessary, in order to justify the imperial decrees and imperial acts of robbery and injustice, to announce this doctrine as set forth by Niccolo Machiavelli in his treatise of 400 years ago as adviser of Caesar Borgia and as "brain trust" of Francis I of France.

It was the doctrine of Machiavelli, set up in his treatise on government, bearing the title "The Prince", that the sovereign was beyond the pale of law or courts, and the citizen had no rights which the sovereign should be held to recognize.

The President himself is reported to have issued more decrees or Executive orders having the force of law, than all other Presidents of the United States combined twice over, and then some. But the administration would have the courts to be prohibited from issuing the decrees which they are authorized by the Constitution to issue. This administration has constantly sought through nearly all the bills he has forced through Congress, and is still seeking in this bill, to circumvent the Constitution. In this bill it seeks to place a prohibition upon the rights of the citizen to seek redress in the courts against the tax levies of the A. A. A.—a fundamental right which is as old as that for violation of which George III was indicted by the statement in the Declaration of Independence that—

He has obstructed the administration of justice.

We do not wonder that Tugwell and Moley, Wallace and Frankfurter, declare that we shall never go back to the ideas of 1776, for in the Declaration of Independence, adopted July 4, 1776, we find the following, which is descriptive of the principal evils of this A. A. A. maladministration:

He has erected a multitude of new offices, and sent hither swarms of officers to harass our people and eat out their substance.

Comrade Tugwell promised the Committee on Agriculture that an extra force of 50 persons was all that would be needed to take care of the A. A. A. He now has better than 10,000 on the pay roll of the Government, and a couple hundred of those are the best newspapermen in the country, whose duty it is, under his guidance, to issue propaganda to mislead the people. Their salaries run as high as $9,000, which are paid out of the Public Treasury. The taxpayer is taxed to pay for being fooled, misled, and given false information.

And, again, the Declaration of 1776, signed by the 56 founders of American liberty and drafted by Thomas Jefferson, describes the following evils promoted by this and other new deals, for example:

He has combined with others to subject us to a jurisdiction foreign to our Constitution * * * giving his assent to their acts of pretended legislation. * * * For imposing taxes on us without our consent * * *. For depriving us in many cases of the benefits of trial by jury * * * establishing therein an arbitrary government * * * and fit instrument for introducing the same absolute rule into these Colonies * * * and altering fundamentally the forms of our governments.

It was for such transgressions as these—which have again come into vogue under a new deal older than George III, or Francis I, or Machiavelli and Cesare Borgia—that the signers of the Declaration issued to the world that eternal and thoroughly American idea of 1776, to which Tugwell and Moley, Frankfurter and Cohen, the authors of this bill, say that we shall never go back, namely:

That these United Colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States.

On October 19, 1781, there was enough independent Americanism in this country to compel Lord Cornwallis to surrender his sword to Washington. There was enough of the American spirit to rebel against unconstitutional taxation, the obstruction of justice in American courts, the substitution of autocratic decrees for acts of legislation, the establishment of arbitrary government, and the imperial imposition of autocratic rule for government by laws under the Constitution.

One hundred and fifty years have passed since then. But, if I know anything about the sentiment of this country today, and if I know anything about the true sentiment of the Senators in this Chamber as expressed between the lines of this debate, there is still enough Americanism in America to require "Lord Corn Wallace II" to turn over the sword of the A. A. A. before the nine Justices of the United States Supreme Court break it in two in this coming October term of 1935.

It would be the fitting irony of new-deal fate if, on October 19, 1935, the one hundred and fifty-fifth anniversary of Yorktown, the Supreme Court of America celebrated American tradition by handing down a decision requiring the surrender of "Corn Wallace II."

Who are the Tories in this Senate Chamber who are going to vote against the righteousness of that American decision? It took only 56 signers of the Declaration of Independence to defeat the autocracy for which the first Lord Cornwallis fought. Are there not 56 American patriots in this Senate who are willing to sign a new declaration of independence based on the never-dying doctrine for which our fathers fought and won? Why surrender to the creed of Machiavelli and the creed of Moscow? Let him who swings that $5,000,000,000 war club, while standing upon the Socialist platform of 1932, beware lest the club fall upon him, as it did upon Francis I and George III.

During the delivery of Mr. SCHALL's speech,

Mr. BILBO. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield so that I may secure action on an amendment as to which there will be no controversy?

Mr. SCHALL. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. BILBO. I desire to offer an amendment, which I will ask to have read, as a substitute for section 39 as proposed by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GUFFEY in the chair). The clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 71, line 12, in lieu of the language proposed to be inserted by the committee, it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. 39. No cotton cooperative association shall be eligible for any loan authorized to be made to cooperative associations by any agency of the Government, unless such association handles the products of or supplies of bona fide cotton-producing members (or the products of or supplies of bona fide cotton-producing members of member associations) in an amount at least equal in value to such as are dealt in for persons other than such bona fide members, but all cotton handled by any cooperative association for or on behalf of the United States or any agency or instrumentality thereof shall be disregarded in determining the volume of member and nonmember business handled by such association.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, this is an amendment which was offered to section 39, on page 71 of the bill, which was passed over; and those of us who are interested in this cotton amendment—and I have taken a very great interest in it—have agreed that the substitute may be adopted instead of the committee amendment. I desire to have it agreed to at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is an amendment to the committee amendment on page 64, beginning in line 20 which is pending.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes, Mr. President; but we ask unanimous consent that this amendment be adopted, notwithstanding the fact that there is an amendment pending.

Mr. SMITH. Without prejudice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. I do not object, with the understanding that if next Monday, upon a further examination of the amendment, I desire to submit a qualifying amendment or another sentence to it, I shall have the opportunity.

Mr. McKELLAR. There will be absolutely no objection to it if the Senator finds it necessary to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BILBO] in the nature of a substitute for the committee amendment on page 71, being section 39.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

ORDER FOR RECESS

After the conclusion of Mr. SCHALL's speech,

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its labors today it take a recess until 10 o'clock a. m. Monday next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ACCEPTANCE OF BIDS FOR GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, there is an emergency measure on the Senate Calendar to which I call the attention of the Senate. It is a matter I have discussed with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY]. Therefore I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Calendar No. 1193, being Senate Joint Resolution 163. I will explain the joint resolution as soon as it shall have been laid before the Senate for consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 163) to authorize the acceptance of bids for Government contracts made subject to codes of fair competition, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That no bid submitted prior to the enactment of this joint resolution in response to the invitation of any executive department, independent establishment, or other agency or instrumentality of the United States, the District of Columbia, or any corporation all the stock of which is owned by the United States (all of the foregoing being hereinafter designated as "agencies of the United States"), if otherwise valid and acceptable, shall be rejected because made subject to the provisions of any code or codes of fair competition, or any related requirements (as provided in Executive Order No. 6646 of Mar. 14, 1934), if the bidder, with the assent of his surety, shall agree in writing that the contract, if entered into, shall, in lieu of such code provisions or other related requirements, be subject to all acts of Congress, enacted after the date of enactment of this joint resolution, requiring the observance of minimum wages, maximum hours, or limitations as to age of employees in the performance of contracts with agencies of the United States. In such cases the compensation provided for in the contract shall be reduced from that stated in the bid by the amount that the contracting officer, subject to the approval of the Comptroller General, shall find the cost of performing the contract is reduced solely by reason of the contractor not complying with the provisions of such code or codes or related requirements; and the compensation for the performance of the contract shall be increased from that fixed in the contract by the amount that the contracting officer, subject to the approval of the Comptroller General, shall find the cost of performing the contract has been increased solely by reason of compliance with such subsequent acts of Congress, if any, relating to the performance of contracts with agencies of the United States.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, before the decision of the United States Supreme Court declaring the N. R. A. unconstitutional, various departments of the Government had invited bids for the purchase of supplies, for construction work and for various other undertakings. All of the bids were for contracts subject to code competition. After the decision of the Supreme Court, the Comptroller General ruled that these bids were illegal, and that it might be necessary for the departments to resubmit their propositions for rebidding. This would mean much delay, and create a good deal of confusion, and many Senators have had appeals for relief made to them from bidders who were the lowest bidders on the various undertakings of the Government.

It is therefore proposed, after consultation with the various departments of the Government and the General Accounting Office, that the joint resolution now being considered should be enacted into law.

This joint resolution makes valid these bids, if the bidder with the assent of his surety, shall agree in writing that the contract entered into, shall, in lieu of such code provisions, be subject to all acts of Congress enacted after the date of enactment of the joint resolution, requiring the observance of minimum wages, maximum hours, or limitations as to age of employees in the performance of contracts with agencies of the United States.

The joint resolution was submitted to various departments of the Government and also to the Comptroller General, is in form satisfactory, and will remedy the necessity of the readvertisement of such bids, which without this resolution now are being rejected by order of the Comptroller General.

In view of this explanation, I hope the joint resolution may be passed and go to the other House, so that there may be no further delay in the disposal of this vast volume of public business.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will refer to a situation which arose in the Joint Committee on Printing. We advertised for bids for newsprint and other paper and envelops as required by law. Under the old code arrangement bids came in, but then the decision of the Supreme Court was handed down and the committee thought there was nothing to do but to reject the bids and to call for new bids, as we did. I do not want any complication about that, and I suppose the joint resolution would scarcely refer to a situation such as that?

Mr. WALSH. Not at all. I might say that several departments have tried personally to negotiate with the lowest bidder to meet these requirements in writing so that they would be able to make contracts with them. I ask for a vote on the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS ON MONDAY

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, under the agreement which has been entered, the Senate will meet at 10 o'clock a. m. on Monday next to continue consideration of the A. A. A. amendments. It seems to me the consideration of this subject should be brought to a conclusion on that day, and I hope that Senators will contribute to that end.

REFINANCING OF FARM INDEBTEDNESS

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter from former Representative Wefald, of Minnesota, who is now a member of the railroad commission of that State. The letter is addressed to Representative LEMKE and has reference to the so-called "Frazier-Lemke farm-refinancing bill."

I wish to say that this bill is on the calendar of the Senate and is pending before the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives. There is a petition pending in that body asking for the discharge of the committee, in order that the bill may be brought to the floor of the House.

The letter of Mr. Wefald is very interesting. The bill has been endorsed by the legislatures of 32 States and the farm organizations all over the country are in favor of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter referred to is as follows:

MINNESOTA RAILROAD AND WAREHOUSE COMMISSION,
STATE OFFICE BUILDING,
St. Paul, July 16, 1935.

Congressman WILLIAM LEMKE,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I have just read the Minneapolis Daily Star for today, which carries a front-page leader article relative to the chances for passage of the Frazier-Lemke refinancing bill in this session of Congress. It is the most heartening news that I have read for a long time, as it holds out hope to the debt-ridden farmers of the Northwest that eventually some measure of justice may be afforded to them.

The headline says Frazier-Lemke national plan nears success. It goes on to give the history of the fight to bring about the passage of the bill by bringing the bill out of the committee and to a vote in the House. The article states that 204 names were secured on the discharge petition, but that thereupon the administration leaders became busy, and were instrumental in having a number of Congressmen withdraw their names from the petition, leaving the number of those who stood pat at 189. The article goes on to say that it now looks very likely that 216 names will be obtained for the withdrawal petition, and that if the bill is ever brought out of the committee it is sure to pass in the House.

The article states that the administration leaders had scared the men who withdrew their names from the petition to do so by intimating that the President would veto the bill if it came to him. It goes on to state that the movers of the bill organized and sent to the President a committee for a "face to face show-down on the veto report." It then goes on to state "the President told the committee that he had authorized no one to say he would reject the measure if it was enacted."

The news contained in this last quotation is the most heartening and most welcome news that has come to the farmers of the Northwest since Mr. Roosevelt was inaugurated as President.

You know how splendidly the Northwest States supported the President for election in 1932, but the greatest disappointment to the farmers has been the fact that so far it has been impossible to induce Congress to pass the Frazier-Lemke refinancing bill, and that it has been assiduously circulated out here that the President was opposed to the enactment into law of this bill.

I have traveled extensively in Minnesota this summer, and I am in close touch with the situation in North and South Dakota and, to some extent, with the situation in Wisconsin, and I know that there is no measure before Congress at this time, nor has there since March 4, 1933, been a proposal before Congress in which the farmers have been as much interested as they are in the Frazier-Lemke refinancing bill.

The people out here will be with the President in his great fight, in his taxation proposal, which some people dub a "share-the-wealth" plan. They are with him in his stand relative to the country possibly in some respects having outgrown the Federal Constitution. They are with him in his public utilities' fight, although this fight to clean up the public utilities' mess does not mean so much to the farmers as to the urban population because only a small number of the farmers have as yet enjoyed the services of the electric utilities.

I have heard many grumblings against the administration in the farming country during this summer, and the murmur is growing louder and more pronounced, I am sorry to say, but I believe that the passage by Congress, and the approval of the President, of the Frazier-Lemke refinancing bill, will rehabilitate the President with the farmers of the Northwest in the high place in their estimation that he held during the first 2 years of his incumbency of the Presidency.

I further want to state that it is my belief that if the Frazier-Lemke refinancing bill is not acted upon in this session that its results relative to the President's chances for carrying the votes of the northwestern States in the next election will not be what I and many, many other people would like to see it.

The farmer is a proud fellow. A dole may be very agreeable and acceptable to many of the urban population of the country, but it does not appeal to the farmer. The farmer wants to be rehabilitated in the private ownership of his farm, which he wants to continue to operate under his own private initiative, but it has come to be the deep-seated belief of the average farmer in the Northwest that without the passage of the Frazier-Lemke refinancing bill the farming class will never be rehabilitated into the proud position that it once held.

We people out in the Northwest cannot understand why this measure should be termed an inflationary measure, because the Treasury notes used in the payment of the farm debts will be founded upon the fertile and productive soil of the farms of the United States, the best security in the United States and in the world. No industrial security can in any sense compare with the security offered by our farmers.

The low rate of interest promised the farmers in this proposal is absolutely essential to the farmers if it is ever hoped or expected that the farmers shall be able to be put on their feet again.

I began to talk the ideas contained in the Frazier-Lemke bill in my campaign for reelection to Congress in 1926. I am quite sure that I was the only man in Congress, and that includes both Houses of Congress, who took such a stand at that time. I was not able to get very many to listen to me, and many people told me that I was crazy; but, due to the glorious fight that you have fought for the farmers in the furtherance of this proposal—and I think the fight that you have been making is one of the greatest fights for justice, for human rights, for the farmers especially—that has been made in the history of Congress; and there is no matter before Congress at this time upon which the concensus of the opinion of the American farmers is so united as it is at this time in favor of the passage of this proposal.

I hope that Congress will see the light that it may give particular and favorable action on the Frazier-Lemke bill or it will be, if action is not taken in the present session of Congress, notice to the farmers of the United States, and we shall so consider it here in the Northwest that the President, in spite of all the many great achievements to his credit and his administration, are not concerned about the welfare of the farmers of the United States.

We are yet a thousand miles from the solution of the present economic depression which we are in, and we people of the Northwest are absolutely sure that as the farmer was the cornerstone of our national prosperity in the past, he must again come into that position or there will not be any prosperity in the United States, but unbounded and unlimited misery. It is to be hoped that the present Congress and the President will do what they can to take us out of our misery.

I wish you good luck in your present strenuous undertaking, and I join with the hundreds of thousands of farmers of the Northwest who are asking upon you God's blessing and that He may give you strength to triumph for the people whose champion you have been in this great and holy cause.

Very sincerely,

KNUD WEFALD, Commissioner.
